WITH ILLUSTRATIONS BY WILLIAM HENRY

Two hundred and thirty years ago the shores of Lake Superior were the scene of a strange and terrible scene. In the year 1622, a French Jesuit missionary, Father Claude Allouez, was sent to the shores of the lake to preach the Gospel to the Indians. He found the Indians in a state of great ignorance and superstition. He was the first white man to see the lake, and he was the first to describe it to the world. He was the first to see the great white rock of Lake Superior, and he was the first to see the great white rock of Lake Superior. Five years later came the first white man of Lake Superior, and he was the first to see the Indians in the forest near the Mohawk River.
