MDCCXXI.

THERE is not, in my opinion, a consideration more effectual to extinguish inordinate desires in the Soul of man, than the notions of Plato and his followers upon that subject. They tell us, that every passion which has been contracted by the Soul during her residence in the body, remains with her in a separate state; and that the Soul in the body, or out of the body, differs no more than the man does from himself when he is in his house, or in open air. When therefore the obscene passions in particular have once taken root, and spread themselves in the Soul, they cleave to her inseparably, and remain in her for ever after the body is cast off and thrown aside. As an argument to confirm this their doctrine they observe, that a lewd youth who goes on in a continued course of voluptuousness, advances by degrees into a libidinous old man; and that the passion survives in the mind when it is altogether dead in the body; nay, that the desire grows more violent, and (like all other habits) gathers strength by age, at the same time that it has no power of executing its own purposes. If, say they, the Soul is the moi subject to these passions at a time when she has the least infla-ration from the body, we may well suppose she will still retain them when she is entirely divelled of it. The very substance of the Soul is senned with them; the gangrene is gone too far to be ever cured; the inflammation will rage to all eternity.

In this therefore (say the Platonists) consists the punishment of a vo-luptuous man after death: He is tormented with desires which it is impossible for him to gratify, solicited by a passion that has neither objects nor organs adapted to it: he lives in a state of invincible desire and impotence, and always burns in the pursuit of what he always despairs to possess. It is for this reason (says Plato) that the Souls of the dead ap-ppear frequently in cemeteries, and hover about the places where their bodies
bodies are buried, as still hankering after their old brutish pleasures, and desiring again to enter the body that gave them an opportunity of fulfilling them.

Some of our most eminent Divines have made use of this Platonick notion, so far as it regards the subsistence of our passions after death, with great beauty and strength of reason. Plato indeed carries his thought very far, when he grafts upon it his opinion of Ghosts appearing in places of burial. Though, I must confess, if one did believe that the departed Souls of men and women wandered up and down these lower regions, and entertained themselves with the sight of their species, one could not devise a more proper Hell for an impure Spirit than that which Plato has touched upon.

The Ancients seem to have drawn such a state of torments in the description of Tantalus, who was punished with the rage of an eternal thirst, and set up to the chin in water that fled from his lips whenever he attempted to drink it.

Virgil, who has cast the whole system of Platonick Philosophy, so far as it relates to the Soul of man, into beautiful allegories, in the sixth book of his Aeneid gives us the punishment of a voluptuary after death, not unlike that which we are here speaking of.

—Lucent genialibus altis
  Aurea fulcras, epulque ante ora parata
Regifico luxu; furtarum maxima junctus
Accubat, et manibus prohibet consingere mensas;
Excugisque facem attollens, atque intonat ore.

They lie below on golden beds display'd,
And genial feasts with regal pomp are made.
The Queen of Furies by their side is set,
And snatches from their mouths unburn'd meat;
Which if they touch, her hissing snakes she rears;
Tossing her torch, and thund'ring in their ears.

Dryd.

That I may a little alleviate the severity of this my Speculation (which otherwise may lose me several of my polite Readers) I shall translate a story that has been quoted upon another occasion by one of the most learned men of the present age, as I find it in the original. The Reader will see it is not foreign to my present subject, and I dare say will think it a lively representation of a person lying under the torments of such a kind kind of Tantalism, or Platonick Hell, as that which we have now under consideration. Monsieur Pontignan, speaking of a love-adventure that happened to him in the country, gives the following account of it.

"When I was in the country last summer, I was often in company with a couple of charming women, who had all the wit and beauty one could desire in female companions, with a dash of coquetry, that from time to time gave me a great many agreeable torments. I was, after my way, in love with both of them, and had such frequent opportunities of pleading my passion to them when they were absent, that I had reason to hope for particular favours from each of them.

"As I was walking one evening in my chamber with nothing about me but my Night-gown, they both came into my room and told me, they had a very pleasant trick to put upon a Gentleman that was in the same house, provided I would bear a part in it. Upon this they told me of a plausible story, that I laughed at their contrivance, and agreed to do whatever they should require of me. They immediately began to swaddle me up in my Night-gown with long pieces of linen, which they folded about me till they had wrapt me in above an hundred yards of swathe: my arms were prefixed to my sides, and my legs closed together by so many wrappes one over another, that I looked like an Egyptian mummy. As I stood bolt upright upon one end in this antique figure, one of the Ladies burst out a laughing. And now Pontignan says the, we intend to perform the promise that we find you have extorted from each of us. You have often asked the favour of us, and I dare say you are a better bred Cavalier than to refuse to go to bed to Ladies that desire it of you. After having flood a fit of laughter, I begged them to uncase me, and do with me what they pleased. No, no, say they, we like you very well as you are, and upon that ordered me to be carried to one of their houses, and put to bed in all my swaddles. The room was lighted up on all sides; and I was laid very decently between a pair of sheets, with my head (which was indeed the only part I could move) upon a very high pillow; this was no sooner done, but my two female friends came into bed to me, in their finest Night-cloaths. You may easily guess at the condition of a man that saw a couple of the most beautiful women in the world undress and abed with him, without being able to flir hand or foot. I begged them to release me, and struggled all I could to get loose, which I did with so much violence, that about mid-night they both leaped out of the bed, crying out they were undone. But seeing me safe, they took took their posts again, and renewed their raillery. Finding all my prayers and endeavours were lost, I composed my self as well as I could; and told them, that if they would not unbind me, I would fall asleep between them, and by that means disgrace them for ever. But, alas! this was impossible, could I have been disposed to it, they would have prevented me by several little ill-natured carelessly and endearments which they belittled upon me. As much devoted as I am to womankind, I would not pass such another night to be matter of the whole sex. My Reader will doubtless be curious to know what became of me the next morning: why truly my bed-fellows left me about an hour before day, and told me if I would be good and lie still, they would send some body to take me up as soon as it was time for me to rise; accordingly about nine o’clock in the morning an old woman came to unfasten me. I bore all this very patiently, being resolved to take my revenge of my tormentors, and to keep no measures with them as soon as I was at liberty; but upon asking my old woman what was become of the two Ladies, she told me she believe they were by that time within sight of Paris, for that they went away in a coach and fix before five o’clock in the morning.

---Convivae prope differentia cidentur, Posientes varius mutum diversa palato; Quid dem? quid non dem?--- Hor.

LOOKING over the late packets of letters which have been sent to me, I found the following one.

Mr. Spectator,

"YOUR paper is a part of my Tea-equipage; and my servant knows "my humour so well, that calling for my breakfast this morning "(it being past my usual hour) the answered the Spectator was not "yet come in; but that the Tea-kettle boiled, and he expected it every "moment."
moment. Having thus in part signified to you the esteem and veneration which I have for you, I must put you in mind of the catalogue of books which you have promised to recommend to our sex; for I have deferred furnishing my closet with Authors, till I receive your advice in this particular, being your daily disciple and humble servant.

LEONORA.

In answer to my fair disciple, whom I am very proud of, I must acquaint her, and the rest of my Readers, that since I have called out for help in my catalogue of a Lady’s library, I have received many letters upon that head, some of which I shall give an account of.

In the first class I shall take notice of those which come to me from eminent bookellers, who every one of them mention with respect the Authors they have printed, and consequently have an eye to their own advantage more than to that of the Ladies. One tells me, that he thinks it absolutely necessary for women to have true notions of right and equity, and that therefore they cannot peruse a better book than Dalton’s Country Justice; another thinks they cannot be without The Compleat Jockey. A third observing the curiosity and desire of prying into secrets, which he tells me is natural to the fair sex, is of opinion this female inclination, if well directed, might turn very much to their advantage, and therefore recommends to me Mr. Mede upon the Revelations. A fourth lays it down as an unquestioned truth, that a Lady cannot be thoroughly accomplished who has not read The secret Treaties and Negotiations of the Marshal D’Estrades. Mr. Jacob Tonson, Jun. is of opinion, that Bayle’s Dictionary might be of very great use to the Ladies, in order to make them general scholars. Another, whose name I have forgotten, thinks it highly proper that every woman with child should read Mr. Wall’s History of Infant Baptism; as another is very importunate with me to recommend to all my female Readers The finishing stroke; being a vindication of the Patriarchal Scheme, &c.

In the second class I shall mention Books which are recommended by husbands, if I may believe the writers of them. Whether or no they are real husbands or perfonated ones I cannot tell, but the books they recommend are as follow, A Paraphrase on the History of Susanna. Rules to keep Lent. The Christian’s overthrow prevented. A diffusive from the Playhouse. The virtues of Campbirc, with directions to make Campbirc Tea. The Pleasures of a Country Life. The Government of the Tongue. A letter dated from Cheapside desires me that I would advise all young wives wives to make themselves mistresses of Wingate's Arithmetick, and concludes with a postscript, that he hopes I will not forget The Countess of Kent's receipts.

I may reckon the Ladies themselves as a third class among these my correspondents and privy-counsellors. In a letter from one of them, I am advised to place Pharamond at the head of my catalogue, and, if I think proper, to give the second place to Cassandra. Coquettilla begs me not to think of nailing women upon their knees with manuals of devotion, nor of scorching their faces with books of divinity. Florella desires to know if there are any books written against Prudes, and intreats me, if there are, to give them a place in my Library. Plays of all sorts have their several advocates: All for Love is mentioned in above fifteen letters; Sophonisba, or Hannibal's overthrow, in a dozen; the Innocent Adultery is likewise highly approved of: Mithridates King of Pontus has many friends; Alexander the Great and Aurelian have the same number of voices; but Theodosius, or the Force of Love, carries it from all the rest.

I should, in the last place, mention such books as have been proposed by men of learning, and those who appear competent judges of this matter, and must here take occasion to thank A. B. whoever it is that conceals himself under those two letters, for his advice upon this subject; but as I find the work I have undertaken to be very difficult, I shall defer the executing of it till I am further acquainted with the thoughts of my judicious contemporaries, and have time to examine the several books they offer to me; being resolved, in an affair of this moment, to proceed with the greatest caution.

In the mean while, as I have taken the Ladies under my particular care, I shall make it my business to find out in the best Authors ancient and modern such passages as may be for their use, and endeavour to accommodate them as well as I can to their taste; not questioning but the valuable part of the sex will easily pardon me, if from time to time I laugh at those little vanities and follies which appear in the behaviour of some of them, and which are more proper for ridicule than a serious censure. Most books being calculated for male Readers, and generally written with an eye to men of learning, makes a work of this nature more necessary; besides, I am the more encouraged, because I flatter myself that I see the sex daily improving by these my Speculations. My fair Readers are already deeper scholars than the Beaus; I could name some of them who talk much better than several gentlemen that make a figure at Will's: and as I frequently receive letters from the fine Ladies and pretty Fellows, I cannot but observe that the former are superior to the others not only in the senile but in the spelling. This cannot but have a good effect upon the female world, and keep them from being charmed by those empty coxcombs that have hitherto been admired among the women, though laughed at among the men.

I am credibly informed that Tom Tattle passes for an impertinent fellow, that Will. Trippit begins to be snoaked, and that Frank Smoothly himself is within a month of a coxcomb, in case I think fit to continue this paper. For my part, as it is my business in some measure to detect such as would lead astray weak minds by their false pretences to wit and judgment, humour and gallantry, I shall not fail to lend the best lights I am able to the fair sex for the continuation of these discoveries.

Spatio brevi
Spe mlongam refesc: dum loquimur, fugerit invidia
Ætas: carpe diem, quam minimum credula postero.
Hor.

We all of us complain of the shortness of time, faith Seneca, and yet have much more than we know what to do with. Our lives, says he, are spent either in doing nothing at all, or in doing nothing to the purpose, or in doing nothing that we ought to do: we are always complaining our days are few, and acting as though there would be no end of them. That noble Philosopher has described our inconsistency with ourselves in this particular, by all those various turns of expression and thought which are peculiar to his writings.

I often consider mankind as wholly inconsistent with itself in a point that bears some affinity to the former. Though we seem grieved at the shortness of life in general, we are wishing every period of it at an end. The minor longs to be at age, then to be a man of business, then to make up an estate, then to arrive at honours, then to retire. Thus although the whole life is allowed by every one to be short, the several divisions of it appear long and tedious. We are for lengthening our span in general, but would fain contract the parts of which it is composed. The Uturer would be very well satisfied to have all the time annihilated that lies between the present moment and next quarter-day. The Politician would be contented to lose three years in his life, could he place things in the posture which he fancies they will stand in after such a revolution of time. The Lover would be glad to strike out of his existence all the moments that are to pass away before the happy meeting. Thus, as fast as our time runs, we should be very glad in most parts of our lives that it ran much faster than it does. Several hours of the day hang upon our hands, may we wish away whole years; and travel through time as through a country filled with many wild and empty wastes, which we would fain hurry over, that we may arrive at those several little settlements or imaginary points of rest which are dispersed up and down in it.

If we divide the life of most men into twenty parts, we shall find that at least nineteen of them are mere gaps and chasms, which are neither filled with pleasure nor business. I do not however include in this calculation the life of those men who are in a perpetual hurry of affairs, but of those only who are not always engaged in scenes of action; and I hope I shall not do an unacceptable piece of service to these persons, if I point out to them certain methods for the filling up their empty spaces of life. The methods I shall propose to them are as follow.

The first is the exercise of Virtue, in the most general acceptation of the word. That particular scheme which comprehends the Social Virtues, may give employment to the most industrious temper; and find a man in business more than the most active station of life. To advise the ignorant, relieve the needy, comfort the afflicted, are duties that fall in our way almost every day in our lives. A man has frequent opportunities of mitigating the fierceness of a party; of doing justice to the character of a deserving man; of softening the envious, quieting the angry; and rectifying the prejudiced; which are all of them employments suited to a reasonable nature, and bring great satisfaction to the person who can busy himself in them with discretion.

There is another kind of Virtue that may find employment for those retired hours in which we are altogether left to our selves, and in the absence of company and conversation; I mean that intercourse and communication which every reasonable creature ought to maintain with the great

Author
Author of his being. The man who lives under an habitual sense of the divine presence, keeps up a perpetual cheerfulness of temper, and enjoys every moment the satisfaction of thinking himself in company with his dearest and best of friends. The time never lies heavy upon him: It is impossible for him to be alone. His thoughts and passions are the most busied at such hours, when those of other men are the most inactive:
he no sooner steps out of the world but his heart burns with devotion, wells with hope, and triumphs in the conscienceness of that presence which every where surrounds him: or, on the contrary, pours out its fears, its forrows, its apprehensions, to the great supporter of its existence.

I have here only considered the necessity of a man's being virtuous, that he may have something to do; but if we consider further, that the exercise of Virtue is not only an amusement for the time it lasts, but that its influence extends to those parts of our existence which lie beyond the grave, and that our whole Eternity is to take its colour from those hours which we here employ in Virtue or in Vice, the argument redoubles upon us for putting in practice this method of passing away our time.

When a man has but a little stock to improve, and has opportunities of turning it all to good account, what shall we think of him if he suffers nineteen parts of it to lie dead, and perhaps employs even the twentieth to his ruin or disadvantage? But because the mind cannot be always in its fervours, nor strained up to a pitch of virtue, it is necessary to find out proper employments for it in its relaxations.

The next method therefore that I would propose to fill up our time, should be useful and innocent diversions. I must confess I think it is below reasonable creatures to be altogether conversant in such diversions as are merely innocent, and have nothing else to recommend them, but that there is no hurt in them. Whether any kind of gaming has even thus much to say for itself, I shall not determine; but I think it is very wonderful to see persons of the best sense passing away a dozen hours together in thuffling and dividing a pack of Cards, with no other conversation but what is made up of a few game phrases, and no other Ideas but those of black or red spots ranged together in different figures. Would not a man laugh to hear any one of this species complaining that life is short?

The Stage might be made a perpetual source of the most noble and useful entertainments, were it under proper regulations.
But the mind never unbends itself so agreeably as in the conversation of a well-chosen friend. There is indeed no blessing of life that is any way comparable to the enjoyment of a discreet and virtuous friend. It eases and unloads the mind, clears and improves the understanding, engenders thoughts and knowledge, animates virtue and good resolutions, softens and allays the passions, and finds employment for most of the vacant hours of life.

Next to such an intimacy with a particular person, one would endeavour after a more general conversation with such as are able to entertain and improve those with whom they converse, which are qualifications that seldom go afield.

There are many other useful amusements of life, which one would endeavour to multiply, that one might on all occasions have recourse to something, rather than suffer the mind to lie idle, or run adrift with any passion that chances to rife in it.

A man that has a taste of music, painting, or architecture, is like one that has another sense, when compared with such as have no relish of those arts. The florist, the planter, the gardiner, the husbandman, when they are only as accomplishments to the man of fortune, are great reliefs to a country life, and many ways useful to those who are possessed of them.

But of all the diversions of life, there is none so proper to fill up its empty spaces as the reading of useful and entertaining Authors. But this I shall only touch upon, because it in some measure interferes with the third method, which I shall propose in another paper for the employment of our dead inactive hours, and which I shall only mention in general to be, the pursuit of knowledge.

Monday,
The method which I proposed in my Saturday's paper, for filling up those empty spaces of life which are so tedious and burdensome to idle people, is the employing our selves in the pursuit of knowledge. I remember Mr. Boyle, speaking of a certain mineral, tells us that a man may confine his whole life in the study of it, without arriving at the knowledge of all its qualities. The truth of it is, there is not a single science, or any branch of it, that might not furnish a man with business for life, though it were much longer than it is.

I shall not here engage on those beaten subjects of the usefulness of knowledge, nor of the pleasure and perfection it gives the mind, nor on the methods of attaining it, nor recommend any particular branch of it, all which have been the topics of many other writers; but shall indulge my self in a Speculation that is more uncommon, and may therefore perhaps be more entertaining.

I have before shewn how the unemployed parts of life appear long and tedious, and shall here endeavour to shew how those parts of life which are exercised in study, reading, and the pursuits of knowledge, are long but not tedious, and by that means discover a method of lengthening our lives, and at the same time of turning all the parts of them to our advantage.

Mr. Locke observes, "That we get the Idea of time, or duration, by reflecting on that train of Ideas which succeed one another in our minds: that for this reason, when we sleep soundly without dreaming, we have no perception of time, or the length of it, whilst we sleep; and that the moment wherein we leave off to think, till the moment we begin to think again, seem to have no distance. To which the Author adds, And so I doubt not but it would be to a waking man, if it were possible for him to keep only one Idea in his mind, without variation, and the succession of others: and we see, that one who fixes "his his thoughts very intently on one thing, so as to take but little notice of the succession of Ideas that pass in his mind whilst he is taken up with that earnest contemplation, lets slip out of his account a good part of that duration, and thinks that time shorter than it is.

We might carry this thought further, and consider a man as, on one side, shortening his time by thinking on nothing, or but a few things; so, on the other, as lengthening it, by employing his thoughts on many subjects, or by entertaining a quick and constant succession of Ideas.
Accordingly Monleur Mallebranche, in his Enquiry after truth, (which was published several years before Mr. Lock's Essay on human understanding) tells us, that it is possible some creatures may think half an hour as long as we do a thousand years; or look upon that space of duration which we call a minute, as an hour, a week, a month, or an whole age.

This notion of Monleur Mallebranche is capable of some little explanation from what I have quoted out of Mr. Lock; for if our notion of time is produced by our reflecting on the succession of Ideas in our mind, and this succession may be infinitely accelerated or retarded, it will follow, that different beings may have different notions of the same parts of duration, according to their Ideas, which we suppose are equally distinct in each of them, follow one another in a greater or less degree of rapidity.

There is a famous passage in the Alcoran, which looks as if Mabomet had been poetified of the notion we are now speaking of. It is there said, that the Angel Gabriel took Mabomet out of his bed one morning to give him a sight of all things in the seven heavens, in paradise, and in hell, which the Prophet took a distinct view of; and after having held ninety thousand conferences with God, was brought back again to his bed. All this, says the Alcoran, was transferred in so small a space of time, that Mabomet at his return found his bed still warm, and took up an earthen pitcher, (which was thrown down at the very instant that the Angel Gabriel carried him away) before the water was all spilt.

There is a very pretty story in the Turkish Tales which relates to this passage of that famous Impostor, and bears some affinity to the subject we are now upon. A Sultan of Egypt, who was an Infidel, used to laugh at this circumstance in Mabomet's life, as what was altogether impossible and absurd: but conversing one day with a great Doctor in the law, who had the gift of working miracles, the Doctor told him he would quickly convince him of the truth of this passage in the history of Mabomet, if he would consent to do what he should desire of him. Upon this the Sultan
Sultan was directed to place himself by an huge tub of water, which he did accordingly; and as he stood by the tub amidst a circle of his great men, the holy man bid him plunge his head into the water, and draw it up again: the King accordingly thrust his head into the water, and at the same time found himself at the foot of a mountain on a sea-shore. The King immediately began to rage against his Doctor for this piece of treachery and witchcraft; but at length, knowing it was in vain to be angry, he set himself to think on proper methods for getting a livelihood in this strange country: accordingly he applied himself to some people whom he saw at work in a neighbouring wood; these people conducted him to a town that stood at a little distance from the wood, where, after some adventures, he married a woman of great beauty and fortune. He lived with this woman so long that he had by her seven sons and seven daughters: he was afterwards reduced to great wants and forced to think of plying in the streets as a Porter for his livelihood. One day as he was walking alone by the sea-side, being seized with many melancholy reflections upon his former and his present state of life, which had raised a fit of devotion in him, he threw off his cloaths with a design to wash himself, according to the custom of the Mabometans, before he said his prayers.

After his first plunge into the sea, he no sooner raised his head above the water but he found himself standing by the side of the tub, with the great men of his Court about him, and the holy man at his side. He immediately upbraided his teacher for having jest him on such a course of adventures, and betrayed him into so long a state of misery and servitude; but was wonderfully surprized when he heard that the state he talked of was only a dream and delusion; that he had not stirred from the place where he then stood; and that he had only dipped his head into the water, and immediately taken it out again.

The Mabometan Doctor took this occasion of instructing the Sultan, that nothing was impossible with God; and that He, with whom a thousand years are but as one day, can, if He pleases, make a single day, nay a single moment, appear to any of His creatures as a thousand years.

I shall leave my Reader to compare these Eastern fables with the notions of those two great Philosophers whom I have quoted in this paper; and shall only, by way of application, desire him to consider how we may extend life beyond its natural dimensions, by applying our selves diligently to the pursuits of knowledge.
The hours of a wise man are lengthened by his ideas; as those of a Fool are by his passions: the time of the one is long, because he does not know what to do with it; so is that of the other, because he distinguishes every moment of it with useful or amusing thoughts; or in other words, because the one is always willing it away, and the other always enjoying it.

How different is the view of past life, in the man who is grown old in knowledge and wisdom, from that of him who is grown old in ignorance and folly? The latter is like the owner of a barren country, that fills his eye with the prospect of naked hills and plains, which produce nothing either profitable or ornamental; the other beholds a beautiful and spacious landscape, divided into delightful gardens, green meadows, fruitful fields, and can scarce cast his eye on a single spot of his possessions, that is not covered with some beautiful plant or flower.

\[\text{T} \text{here is not so variable a thing in nature as a Lady's Head-dress: within my own memory I have known it rise and fall above thirty degrees. About ten years ago it shot up to a very great height, insomuch that the female part of our species were much taller than the men. The women were of such an enormous stature, that we appeared as Grasshoppers before them; at present the whole sex is in a manner dwarfed and shrunk into a race of beauties that seems almost another species. I remember several Ladies, who were once very near seven foot high, that at present want some inches of five; how they came to be thus curtailed I cannot learn; whether the whole sex be at present under any penance which we know nothing of, or whether they have cast their Head-dresses in order to surmise us with something in that kind which shall be entirely new; or whether some of the tallett of the sex, being too cunning for the rest, have contrived this method to make...} \] make themselves appear sizeable, is still a secret; though I find most are of opinion, they are at present like trees new lopped and pruned, that will certainly sprout up and flourish with greater heads than before. For my own part, as I do not love to be insulted by women who are taller than my self, I admire the sex much more in their present humiliation, which has reduced them to their natural dimensions, than when they had extended their persons, and lengthened themselves out into formidable and gigantic figures. I am not for adding to the beautiful edifice of nature, nor for raising any whimsical superstructure upon her plans: I must therefore repeat it, that I am highly pleased with the Coiffure now in fashion, and think it shews the good sense which at present very much reigns among the valuable part of the sex. One may observe, that women in all ages have taken more pains than men to adorn the outside of their heads; and indeed I very much admire, that those female Architects, who raise such wonderful structures out of Ribbands, Lace, and Wire, have not been recorded for their respective inventions. It is certain there have been as many orders in these kinds of building, as in those which have been made of marble: Sometimes they rise in the shape of a pyramid, sometimes like a tower, and sometimes like a steeple. In Juvenal’s time the building grew by several orders and stories, as he has very humorously described it.

Tot premitt ordinibus, tot adhuc comagibus altum.
Adscisc caput: Andromachea a fronte videbis;
Post minor est: altam credas.

But I do not remember, in any part of my reading, that the Head-dress aspired to so great an extravagance as in the fourteenth century; when it was built up in a couple of cones or spires, which stood so excessively high on each side of the head, that a woman who was but a Pugny without her Head-dress, appeared like a Colossus upon putting it on. Monsieur Paradis says, “That these old fashioned fontanges rose an ell above the head; that they were pointed like steeple, and had long loose pieces of Crape fastened to the tops of them, which were curiously fringed, and hung down their backs like streamers.

The women might possibly have carried this Gothick building much higher, had not a famous Monk, Thomas Connete by name, attacked it with great zeal and resolution. This holy man travelled from place to place to preach down this monstrous commode, and succeeded so well in it, that as the Magicians sacrificed their books to the flames upon the preaching of an Apostle, many of the women threw down their Headdresses in the middle of his Sermon, and made a bonfire of them within fight of the Pulpit. He was so renowned, as well for the sanctity of his life as his manner of preaching, that he had often a congregation of twenty thousand people: the men placing themselves on the one side of his Pulpit, and the women on the other, that appeared (to use the similitude of an ingenious writer) like a forest of Cedars with their heads reaching to the clouds. He so warmed and animated the people against this monfrous ornament, that it lay under a kind of persecution; and whenever it appeared in publick, was pelled down by the rabble, who flung stones at the persons that wore it. But notwithstanding this Prodigy vanished while the preacher was among them, it began to appear again some months after his departure, or to tell it in Monseur Paradis’s own words, “The women that, like snails in a fright, had drawn in their horns, shot them out again as soon as the danger was over. This extravagance of the women’s Head-dresses in that age is taken notice of by Monseur d’Argentre in his history of Bretagne, and by other Historians as well as the person I have here quoted.

It is usually observed, that a good reign is the only time for the making of laws against the exorbitance of power; in the same manner an excessive Head-dress may be attacked the most effectually when the fathion is against it. I do therefore recommend this paper to my female Readers by way of prevention.

I would desire the fair sex to consider how impossible it is for them to add any thing that can be ornamental to what is already the masterpiece of nature. The head has the most beautiful appearance, as well as the highest station, in a human figure. Nature has laid out all her art in beautifying the face; she has touched it with Vermilion, planted in it a double row of Ivory, made it the seat of smiles and blushing, lighted it up and enlivened it with the brightness of the eyes, hung it on each side with curious organs of sense, given it airs and graces that cannot be described, and surrounded it with such a flowing shade of hair as fits all its beauties in the most agreeable light; in short, the seen to have designed the head as the Cupola to the most glorious of her works; and when we load it with such a pile of supernumerary ornaments, we destroy the symmetry of the humane figure, and foolishly contrive to call off the eye from great and real beauties, to childish gew-gaws, ribbands, and bone-lace.

---Turpi secernis Honeshum. Hor.

The Club, of which I have often declared myself a member, were last night engaged in a discourse upon that which passes for the chief point of honour among men and women; and started a great many hints upon the subject, which I thought were entirely new. I shall therefore methodize the several reflections that arose upon this occasion, and present my Reader with them for the Speculation of this day; after having premised, that if there is any thing in this paper which seems to differ with any passage of last Thursday's, the Reader will consider this as the sentiments of the Club, and the other as my own private thoughts, or rather those of Pharamond.

The great point of honour in men is Courage, and in women Chastity. If a man loses his honour in one encounter, it is not impossible for him to regain it in another; a slip in a woman's honour is irrecoverable. I can give no reason for fixing the point of honour to these two qualities, unless it be that each sex sets the greatest value on the qualification which renders them the most amiable in the eyes of the contrary sex. Had men chosen for themselves, without regard to the opinions of the fair sex, I should believe the choice would have fallen on wisdom or virtue; or had women determined their own point of honour, it is probable that wit or good-nature would have carried it against Chastity.

Nothing recommends a man more to the female sex than Courage; whether it be that they are pleased to see one who is a terror to others fall like a slave at their feet, or that this quality supplies their own principal defect, in guarding them from insults, and avenging their quarrels, or that Courage is a natural indication of a strong and sparsely constituted. On the other side, nothing makes a woman more esteemed by the opposite sex than Chastity; whether it be that we always prize those most who are hardest to come at, or that nothing behoves Chastity, with its... its collateral attendants, truth, fidelity, and constancy, gives the man a property in the person he loves, and consequently endears her to him above all things.

I am very much pleased with a passage in the inscription on a monument erected in Westminster Abby to the late Duke and Dutchess of Newcastle: "Her name was Margaret Lucas, youngest sister to the "Lord Lucas of Cotesbeles; a noble family, for all the brothers were "valiant, and all the sisters virtuous.

In books of chivalry, where the point of honour is strained to madness, the whole story runs on Chastity and Courage. The damsel is mounted on a white palfrey, as an emblem of her innocence; and, to avoid scandal, must have a dwarf for her page. She is not to think of a man, till some misfortune has brought a Knight-errant to her relief. The Knight falls in love, and did not gratitude restrain her from murdering her deliverer, would die at her feet by her disdain. However, he must waste many years in the desert, before her Virgin-heart can think of a surrender. The Knight goes off, attacks every thing he meets that is bigger and stronger than himself, seeks all opportunities of being knocked on the head, and after seven years rambling returns to his mistress, whose Chastity has been attacked in the mean time by giants and tyrants, and undergone as many trials as her lover's valour.

In Spain, where there are still great remains of this romantic humour, it is a transporting favour for a lady to cast an accidental glance on her lover from a window, though it be two or three stories high; as it is usual for a lover to allude his passion for his mistress, in single combat with a mad bull.

The great violation of the point of honour from man to man, is giving the lie. One may tell another he whores, drinks, blasphemes, and it may pass unresented; but to say he lies, though but in jest, is an affront that nothing but blood can expiate. The reason perhaps may be, because no other vice implies so much of courage as this making a lie; and therefore telling a man he lies, is touching him in the most sensible part of honour, and indirectly calling him a coward. I cannot omit under this head what Herodotus tells us of the ancient Persians; that from the age of five years to twenty they instruct their sons only in three things, to manage the horse, to make use of the bow, and to speak truth.

The placing the point of honour in this false kind of courage, has given occasion to the very refuse of mankind, who have neither virtue nor common common sense, to set up for men of honour. An English Peer, who has not been long dead, used to tell a pleasant story of a French Gentleman that visited him early one morning at Paris, and after great professions of respect, let him know that he had it in his power to oblige him; which in short, amounted to this, that he believed he could tell his Lordship the person's name who jilted him as he came out from the Opera; but before he would proceed, he begged his Lordship that he would not deny him the honour of making him his second. The English Lord, to avoid being drawn into a very foolish affair, told him that he was under engagements for his two next Duels to a couple of particular friends. Upon which the Gentleman immediately withdrew, hoping his Lordship would not take it ill if he meddled no farther in an affair from whence he himself was to receive no advantage.

The beating down this false notion of honour, in so vain and lively a people as those of France, is deservedly looked upon as one of the most glorious parts of their present King's reign. It is pity but the punishment of these mischievous notions should have in it some particular circumstances of shame and infamy; that those who are slaves to them may feel that instead of advancing their reputations, they lead them to ignominy and dishonour.

Death is not sufficient to deter men, who make it their glory to despise it; but if every one that fought a Duel were to stand in the pillory, it would quickly lessen the number of these imaginary men of honour, and put an end to so absurd a practice.

When honour is a support to virtuous principles, and runs parallel with the Laws of God and our country, it cannot be too much cherished and encouraged: but when the dictates of honour are contrary to those of religion and equity, they are the greatest depravations of humane nature, by giving wrong ambitions and false ideas of what is good and laudable; and should therefore be exploded by all Governments, and driven out as the bane and plague of human society.

Censure, says a late ingenious Author, is the tax a man pays to the publick for being eminent. It is a folly for an eminent man to think of escaping it, and a weakness to be affected with it. All the illustrious persons of antiquity, and indeed of every age in the world, have passed through this fiery persecution. There is no defence against reproach but obscurity; it is a kind of concomitant to greatnes, as Satyrs and Invectives were an essential part of a Roman triumph.

If men of eminence are expos'd to cenure on one hand, they are as much liable to flatteny on the other. If they receive reproaches which are not due to them, they likewise receive praises which they do not deserve. In a word, the man in a high post is never regarded with an indifferent eye, but always considered as a friend or an enemy. For this reason persons in great stations have seldom their true characters drawn till several years after their deaths. Their personal friendships and enmities must cease, and the parties they were engaged in be at an end, before their faults or their virtues can have justice done them. When writers have the least opportunities of knowing the truth, they are in the best disposition to tell it.

It is therefore the privilege of posterity to adjust the characters of illustrious persons, and to set matters right between those antagonists, who by their rivalry for greatnes divided a whole age into factions. We can now allow Caesar to be a great man, without derogating from Pompey; and cele-celebrate the virtues of Cato, without detracting from those of Caesar. Every one that has been long dead has a due proportion of praise allotted him, in which whilst he lived his friends were too profuse, and his enemies too sparing.

According to Sir Isaac Newton's calculations, the last Comet that made its appearance in 1680, imbibed so much heat by its approaches to the Sun, that it would have been two thousand times hotter than red hot Iron, had it been a globe of that metal; and that supposing it as big as the Earth, and at the same distance from the Sun, it would be fifty thousand years in cooling, before it recovered its natural temper. In the like manner, if an Englishman considers the great ferment into which our political world is thrown at present, and how intently it is heated in all its parts, he cannot suppose that it will cool again in less than three hundred years. In such a tract of time it is possible that the heats of the present age may be extinguished, and our several clads of great men represented under their proper characters. Some eminent Historian may then probably arise, that will not write recentibus odis (as Tacitus expresses it) with the passions and prejudices of a contemporary Author, but make an impartial distribution of fame among the great men of the present age.

I cannot forbear entertaining my self very often with the idea of such an imaginary Historian describing the reign of ANNE the First, and introducing it with a Preface to his Reader; that he is now entering upon the most shining part of the English story. The great rivals in fame will be then distinguished according to their respective merits, and shine in their proper points of light. Such an one (says the Historian) though variously represented by the writers of his own age, appears to have been a man of more than ordinary abilities, great application, and uncommon integrity: nor was such an one (though of an opposite party and interest) inferior to him in any of these respects. The several antagonists who now endeavour to depreciate one another, and are celebrated or traduced by different parties, will then have the same body of admirers, and appear illustrious in the opinion of the whole British nation. The deserving man, who can now recommend himself to the esteem of but half his countrymen, will then receive the approbations and applause of a whole age.

Among the several persons that flourish in this glorious reign, there is no quest for but such a future Historian as the person of whom I am speaking.
ing, will make mention of the men of genius and learning, who have now any figure in the British nation. For my own part, I often flatter my self with the honourable mention which will then be made of me; and have drawn up a paragraph in my own imagination, that I fancy will not be altogether unlike what will be found in some page or other of this imaginary Historian.

It was under this reign, says he, that the Spectator published those little diurnal Essays which are still extant. We know very little of the name or person of this Author, except only that he was a man of a very short face, extremely addicted to silence, and a great lover of knowledge, that he made a voyage to Grand Cairo for no other reason, but to take the measure of a Pyramid. His chief friend was one Sir Roger de Coverley, a whimsical country Knight, and a Temple. whole name he has not transmitted to us. He lived as a lodger at the house of a widow-woman, and was a great humourist in all parts of his life. This is all we can affirm with any certainty of his person and character. As for his Speculations, notwithstanding the several obsolete words and obscure phrasal of the age in which he lived, we still understand enough of them to see the diversions and characters of the English nation in his time: not but that we are to make allowance for the mirth and humour of the Author, who has doubtless strained many representations of things beyond the truth. For if we interpret his words in their literal meaning, we must suppose that women of the first quality used to pass away whole mornings at a Puppet-show: that they attested their principles by their patches: that an Audience would fit out an evening to hear a dramatical performance written in a language which they did not understand: that chairs and flower-pots were introduced as Actors upon the British stage: that a promiscuous assembly of men and women were allowed to meet at midnight in masques within the verge of the Court; with many improbabilities of the like nature. We must therefore, in these and the like cases, suppose that these remote hints and allusions aimed at some certain follies which were then in vogue, and which at present we have not any notion of. We may guess by several passages in the Speculations, that there were writers who endeavoured to detract from the works of this Author; but as nothing of this nature is come down to us, we cannot guess at any objections that could be made to his paper. If we consider his style with that indulgence which we must shew to old English writers, or if we look into the variety of his subjects, with those sevveral critical dissertations, moral reflections,

The following part of the paragraph is so much to my advantage, and beyond anything I can pretend to, that I hope my Reader will excuse me for not inserting it.

No. 102. Wednesday, June 27.

--- Lupus animo debent aliquando dari,
Ad cogitandum melior ut redeat sibi.
Phædr.

I do not know whether to call the following Letter a satyr upon Coquettes, or a representation of their several fantastical accomplishments, or what other title to give it; but as it is I shall communicate it to the publick. It will sufficiently explain its own intentions, so that I shall give it my Reader at length without either Preface or Postscript.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

"WOMEN are armed with Fans as men with Swords, and sometimes do more execution with them. To the end therefore that Ladies may be entire Mistresses of the weapon which they bear, I have erected an Academy for the training up of young women in the Exercise of the Fan, according to the most fashionable airs and motions that are now practised at Court. The Ladies who carry Fans under me are drawn up twice a day in my great Hall, where they are instructed in the use of their Arms, and exercised by the following words of command,

Handle your Fans,
Unfurl your Fans, Discharge your Fans, Ground your Fans, Recover your Fans,
Flutter your Fans.

By
By the right observation of these few plain words of command, a woman of a tolerable genius who will apply herself diligently to the exercise for the space of one half year, shall be able to give her Fan all the graces that can possibly enter into that little modified machine.

But to the end that my Readers may form to themselves a right notion of this Exercise, I beg leave to explain it to them in all its parts.

When my female Regiment is drawn up in array, with every one her weapon in her hand, upon my giving the word to handle their Fans, each of them shakes her Fan at me with a smile, then gives her right-hand woman a tap upon the shoulder, then presses her lips with the extremity of her Fan, then lets her arms fall in an easy motion, and stands in a readiness to receive the next word of Command. All this is done with a close Fan, and is generally learned in the first week.

The next motion is that of unfurling the Fan, in which are comprehended several little flurts and vibrations, as also gradual and deliberate openings, with many voluntary fellings afiunder in the Fan itself, that are seldom learned under a month’s practice. This part of the Exercise pleases the spectators more than any other, as it discovers on a sudden an infinite number of Cupids, Garlands, Altars, Birds, Beasts, Rainbows, and the like agreeable figures, that display themselves to view, whilst every one in the Regiment holds a picture in their hand.

Upon my giving the word to discharge their Fans, they give one general crack that may be heard at a considerable distance when the wind fits fair. This is one of the most difficult parts of the Exercise; but I have several Ladies with me, who at their first entrance could not give a pop loud enough to be heard at the further end of a room, who can now discharge a Fan in such a manner, that it shall make a report like a pocket-pistol. I have likewise taken care (in order to hinder young women from letting off their Fans in wrong places or unuitable occasions) to shew upon what subject the crack of a Fan may come in properly: I have likewise invented a Fan, with which a girl of sixteen, by the help of a little wind which is enclosed about one of the largest sticks, can make as loud a crack as a woman of fifty with an ordinary Fan.

When the Fans are thus discharged, the word of command in course is to ground their Fans. This teaches a Lady to quit her Fan gracefully when she throws it aside in order to take up a pack of cards.
"adjust a curl of hair, replace a falling pin, or apply her self to any other matter of importance. This part of the Exercise, as it only consists in toasting a Fan with an air upon a long table (which stands by for that purpose) may be learned in two days time as well as in a twelvemonth.
"When my female regiment is thus disarmed, I generally let them walk about the room for some time; when on a sudden (like Ladies that look upon their watches after a long visit) they all of them halten to their arms, catch them up in a hurry, and place themselves in their proper stations upon my calling out recover your Fans. This part of the Exercise is not difficult, provided a woman applies her thoughts to it.

"The fluttering of the Fan is the last, and indeed the master-piece of the whole Exercise; but if a Lady does not mis-spend her time, the may make her self mistress of it in three months. I generally lay aside the dog-days and the hot time of the summer for the teaching this part of the Exercise, for as soon as ever I pronounce flutter your Fans, the place is filled with so many zephyrs and gentle breezes as are very refreshing in that season of the year, though they might be dangerous to Ladies of a tender constitution in any other.

"There is an infinite variety of motions to be made use of in the flutter of a Fan: There is the angry Flutter, the modest Flutter, the timorous Flutter, the confused Flutter, the merry Flutter, and the anomorphic Flutter. Not to be tedious, there is scarce any emotion in the mind which does not produce a suitable agitation in the Fan;
inasmuch, that if I only see the Fan of a disciplined Lady, I know very well whether she laughs, frowns, or blushes. I have seen a Fan so very angry, that it would have been dangerous for the absent lover who provoked it to have come within the wind of it: and at other times so very languishing, that I have been glad for the Lady's sake the lover was at a sufficient distance from it. I need not add, that a Fan is either a Prude or Coquette, according to the nature of the person who bears it. To conclude my letter, I must acquaint you that I have from my own observations compiled a little Treatise for the use of my scholars, intitled, The Passions of the Fan; which I will communicate to you, if you think it may be of use to the publick. I shall have a general review on Thursday next; to which you shall be very welcome if you will honour it with your presence.

I am, &c.

June 30.

---Id arbitr
Adprime in vita esse utile, ne quid nimis. Ter. And.

MY friend WILL. HONEYCOMB values himself very much upon what he calls the knowledge of mankind, which has cost him many disasters in his youth; for WILL. reckons every misfortune that he has met with among the women, and every encounter among the men, as parts of his education, and fancies he should never have been the man he is, had not he broke windows, knocked down constables, disturbed honest people with his midnight serenades, and beat up a lewd woman's quarters, when he was a young fellow. The engaging in adventures of this nature WILL. calls the studying of mankind; and terms this knowledge of the town, the knowledge of the world. WILL. ingeniously confesses, that for half his life his head asked every morning with reading of men over-night; and at present comforts himself under certain pains which he endures from time to time, that without them he could not have been acquainted with the gallantries of the age. This WILL. looks upon as the learning of a Gentleman, and regards all other kinds of science as the accomplishments of one whom he calls a Scholar, a Bookish man, or a Philosopher.

For these reasons WILL. shines in mixed company, where he has the discretion not to go out of his depth, and has often a certain way of making his real ignorance appear a seeming one. Our Club however has frequently caught him tripping, at which times they never spare him. For as WILL. often inflicts us with the knowledge of the town, we sometimes take our revenge upon him by our knowledge of books.

He was last week producing two or three letters which he wrote in his youth to a Coquette Lady. The raillery of them was natural, and well enough enough for a meer man of the town; but, very unluckily, several of the words were wrong spelt. Will. laught this off at first as well as he could, but finding himself pushed on all sides, and especially by the Templer, he told us, with a little passion, that he never liked pedantry in spelling, and that he spelt like a Gentleman, and not like a Scholar: upon this Will had recourse to his old topic of shewing the narrow-priightednesh, the pride, and ignorance of pedants; which he carried so far, that upon my retiring to my lodgings, I could not forbear throwing together such reflections as occurred to me upon that subject.

A man who has been brought up among books, and is able to talk of nothing else, is a very indifferent companion, and what we call a Pedant. But, methinks, we should enlarge the title, and give it every one that does not know how to think out of his profession, and particular way of life.

What is a greater Pedant than a meer man of the town? bairr him the play-houses, a catalogue of the reigning beauties, and an account of a few fashionable distempers that have befallen him, and you strike him dumb. How many a pretty Gentleman’s knowledge lies all within the verge of the Court? he will tell you the names of the principal favourites, repeat the shrill sayings of a man of quality, whisper an intrigue that is not yet blown upon by common fame; or, if the sphere of his observations is a little larger than ordinary, will perhaps enter into all the incidents, turns, and revolutions in a game of Ombre. When he has gone thus far, he has shown you the whole circle of his accomplishments, his parts are drained, and he is disabled from any further conversation. What are these but rank Pedants? and yet these are the men who value themselves most on their exemption from the pedantry of Colleges.

I might here mention the Military Pedant, who always talks in a camp, and is borming towns, making lodgments, and fighting battles from one end of the year to the other. Every thing he speaks smells of gunpowder; if you take away his artillery from him, he has not a word to say for himself. I might likewise mention the Law Pedant, that is perpetually putting cafes, repeating the transactions of Westminster-hall, wrangling with you upon the most indifferent circumstances of life, and not to be convinced of the distance of a place, or of the most trivial point in conversation, but by dint of argument. The State Pedant is wrapt up in news, and lost in politics. If you mention either of the Kings of Spain or Poland, he talks very notably; but if you go out of the Gazette, you drop him. In short, a meer Courrier, a meer Soldier, a meer Scholar, Scholar, a mere any thing, is an insipid pedantick character, and equally ridiculous.

Of all the species of Pedants, which I have mentioned, the Book-pedant is much the most supportable: he has at least an exercised understanding, and a head which is full though confused, so that a man who converses with him may often receive from him hints of things that are worth knowing, and what he may possibly turn to his own advantage, though they be of little use to the owner. The worst kind of Pedants among learned men, are such as are naturally endowed with a very small share of common sense, and have read a great number of books without taste or distinction.

The truth of it is, Learning, like travelling, and all other methods of improvement, as it finishes good sense, so it makes a silly man ten thousand times more insufferable, by supplying variety of matter to his impertinence, and giving him an opportunity of abounding in absurdities.

Shallow Pedants cry up one another much more than men of solid and useful learning. To read the titles they give an editor, or collator of a manuscript, you would take him for the glory of the common-wealth of letters, and the wonder of his age; when perhaps upon examination you find that he has only rectified a Greek particle, or laid out a whole sentence in proper commas.

They are obliged indeed to be thus lavish of their praises, that they may keep one another in countenance; and it is no wonder if a great deal of knowledge, which is not capable of making a man wise, has a natural tendency to make him vain and arrogant.
HAVING often received an invitation from my friend Sir Roger de Coverly to pass away a month with him in the country, I last week accompanied him thither, and am settled with him for some time at his country-house, where I intend to form several of my entangling Speculations. Sir Roger, who is very well acquainted with my humour, lets me rise and go to bed when I please, dine at his own table or in my chamber as I think fit, sit still and say nothing without bidding me be merry. When the Gentlemen of the country come to see him, he only shews me at a distance. As I have been walking in his fields I have observed them stealing a sight of me over an hedge, and have heard the Knight desiring them not to let me see them, for that I hated to be stared at.

I am the more at ease in Sir Roger's family, because it consists of sober and fluid persons; for as the Knight is the best master in the world, he seldom changes his servants; and as he is beloved by all about him, his servants never care for leaving him: by this means his domesticks are all in years, and grown old with their master. You would take his Valet de Chambre for his brother, his Butler grey-headed, his Groom one of the gravest men that I have ever seen, and his Coachman has the looks of a Privy-Councillor. You see the goodness of the Master even in the old house-dog, and in a grey pad that is kept in the stable with great care and tenderness out of regard to his past services, though he has been useless for several years.

I could not but observe with a great deal of pleasure the joy that appeared in the countenances of these ancient domesticks upon my friend's arrival at his country-seat. Some of them could not refrain from tears at the
the sight of their old Master; every one of them pressed forward to do something for him, and seemed discouraged if they were not employed.

At the same time the good old Knight, with a mixture of the father and the master of the family, tempered the enquiries after his own affairs with several kind questions relating to themselves. This humanity and good-nature engages every body to him, so that when he is pleasent upon any of them, all his family are in good humour, and none so much as the person whom he diverts himself with: on the contrary, if he coughs, or betrays any infirmity of old age, it is easy for a flander-by to observe a secret concern in the looks of all his servants.

My worthy friend has put me under the particular care of his Butler, who is a very prudent man, and, as well as the rest of his fellow-servants, wonderfully desirous of pleasing me, because they have often heard their master talk of me as of his particular friend.

My chief companion, when Sir Roger is diverting himself in the woods or the fields, is a very venerable man who is ever with Sir Roger, and has lived at his house in the nature of a Chaplain above thirty years. This Gentleman is a person of good sense and some learning, of a very regular life and obliging conversation: he heartily loves Sir Roger, and knows that he is very much in the old Knight's sight; so that he lives in the family rather as a relation than a dependant.

I have observed in several of my papers, that my friend Sir Roger, amidst all his good qualities, is something of an humourist; and that his Virtues, as well as Imperfections, are as it were tinged by a certain extravagance, which makes them particularly his, and distinguishes them from those of other men. This cast of mind, as it is generally very innocent in itself, so it renders his conversation highly agreeable, and more delightful than the same degree of Sense and Virtue would appear in their common and ordinary colours. As I was walking with him last night, he asked me how I liked the good man whom I have just now mentioned: and without staying for my answer told me, that he was afraid of being inflected with Latin and Greek at his own table; for which reason, he desired a particular friend of his at the University to find him out a Clergyman rather of plain sense than much learning, of a good aspect, a clear voice, a sociable temper, and, if possible, a man that understood a little of Backgammon. My friend, says Sir Roger, found me out this Gentleman, who, besides the endowments required of him, is, they tell me, a good Scholar though he does not shew it. I have given him the patronage of the parish; and because I know his value, have have settled upon him a good Annuity for life. If he out-lives me, he shall find that he was higher in my esteem than perhaps he thinks he is. He has now been with me thirty years; and though he does not know I have taken notice of it, has never in all that time asked any thing of me for himself, though he is every day soliciting me for something in behalf of one or other of my tenants his parishioners. There has not been a law-suit in the parish since he has lived among them: If any dispute arises, they apply themselves to him for the decision; if they do not acquiesce in his judgment, which I think never happened above once, or twice at most, they appeal to me. At his first settling with me, I made him a present of all the good Sermons which have been printed in English; and only begged of him that every Sunday he would pronounce one of them in the Pulpit. Accordingly, he has digested them into such a series, that they follow one another naturally, and make a continued system of practical Divinity.

As Sir Roger was going on in his story, the Gentleman we were talking of came up to us; and upon the Knight's asking him who preached to morrow (for it was Saturday night) told us the Bishop of St. Asaph in the morning, and Dr. South in the afternoon. He then shewed us his list of Preachers for the whole year, where I saw with a great deal of pleasure Archbishop Tillotson, Bishop Sanderson, Doctor Barrow, Doctor Calamy, with several living Authors who have published Discourses of Practical Divinity. I no sooner saw this venerable man in the Pulpit, but I very much approved of my friend's insisting upon the qualifications of a good aspect and a clear voice; for I was so charmed with the gracefulness of his figure and delivery, as well as the difficulties he pronounced, that I think I never passed any time more to my satisfaction. A Sermon repeated after this manner, is like the composition of a Poet in the mouth of a grateful Actor.

I could heartily wish that more of our Country-clergy would follow this example; and instead of wasteing their spirits in laborious compositions of their own, would endeavour after a handsome elocution, and all the other talents that are proper to enforce what has been penned by greater Masters. This would not only be more easy to themselves, but more edifying to the people.
AS I was yesterday morning walking with Sir Roger, before his house, a country-fellow brought him a huge fish, which he told him, Mr. William Wimble had caught that morning; and that he presented it, with his service to him, and intended to come and dine with him. At the same time he delivered a Letter, which my friend read to me as soon as the messenger left him.

Sir Roger,

"I desire you to accept of a Jack, which is the best I have caught this season. I intend to come and stay with you a week, and see how the Perch bite in the Black river. I observed with some concern, the last time I saw you upon the Bowling-green, that your whip wanted a lash to it: I will bring half a dozen with me that I twisted last week, which I hope will serve you all the time you are in the country. I have not been out of the saddle for six days last past, having been at Eaton with Sir John's eldest son. He takes to his learning hugely. I am,

SIR, Your humble Servant, Will. Wimble."

This extraordinary letter, and message that accompanied it, made me very curious to know the character and quality of the Gentleman who sent them; which I found to be as follows. Will. Wimble is younger brother to a Baronet, and descended of the ancient family of the Wimbles. He is now between forty and fifty; but being bred to no business and born to no estate, he generally lives with his elder brother as superintendent of his game. He hunts a pack of Dogs better than any man in the country, and is very famous for finding out a Hare. He is extremely well versed in all the little handicrafts of an idle man; he makes a May-fly to a miracle; and furnishes the whole country with Angle-rods. As he is a good-natured officious fellow, and very much effecmed upon account of his family, he is a welcome guest at every house, and keeps up a good correspondence among all the Gentlemen about him. He carries a Tulip-root in his pocket from one to another, or exchanges a puppy between a couple of friends that live perhaps in the opposite sides of the county. Will is a particular favourite of all the young Heirs, whom he frequently obliges with a Net that he has weaved, or a Setting-dog that he has made himself: he now and then presents a pair of garters of his own knitting to their mothers or sisters; and raises a great deal of mirth among them, by enquiring as often as he meets them how they wear these Gentleman-like manufactures and obliging little humours, make Will the darling of the country.

Sir Roger was proceeding in the character of him, when he saw him make up to us with two or three hazle-twigs in his hand that he had cut in Sir Roger's woods, as he came through them, in his way to the house. I was very much pleased to observe on one side the hearty and sincere welcome with which Sir Roger received him, and on the other the secret joy which his guest discovered at sight of the good old Knight. After the first salutes were over, Will desired Sir Roger to lend him one of his servants to carry a set of shuttle-cocks he had with him, in a little box to a Lady that lived about a mile off, to whom it seemed he had promised such a present for above this half year. Sir Roger's back was no sooner turned, but honest Will began to tell me of a large cock- pheasant that he had sprung in one of the neighbour's woods, with two or three other adventures of the same nature. Odd and uncommon characters are the game that I look for, and most delight in; for which reason I was as much pleased with the novelty of the person that talked to me, as he could be for his life with the springing of a pheasant, and therefore listened to him with more than ordinary attention.

In the midst of his discourse, the bell rung to dinner, where the Gentleman I have been speaking of had the pleasure of seeing the huge jack, he had caught, served up for the first dish in a most sumptuous manner. Upon our sitting down to it, he gave us a long account how he had hooked it, played with it, foiled it, and at length drew it out upon the bank, with several other particulars that lasted all the first course. A dish of wild-fowl that came afterwards furnished conversation for the rest of the dinner, which concluded with a late invention of Will's for improving the quill-pipe.

Upon withdrawing into my room after dinner, I was secretly touched with compassion towards the honest Gentleman that had dined with us; and could not but consider with a great deal of concern how so good an heart and such bese hands were wholly employed in trifles; that so much humanity should be so little beneficial to others, and so much industry so little advantageous to himself. The same temper of mind and application to affairs might have recommended him to the publick esteem, and have raised his fortune in another station of life. What good to his country or himself might not a trader or merchant have done with such useful though ordinary qualifications?

Will Wimble's is the case of many a younger brother of a great family, who had rather see their children starve like Gentlemen, than thrive in a trade or profession that is beneath their quality. This humour fills se-fveral parts of Europe with pride and beggary. It is the happiness of a trading nation, like ours, that the younger sons, though incapable of any liberal art or profession, may be placed in such a way of life, as may perhaps enable them to vie with the best of their family; accordingly we find several citizens that were launched into the world with narrow fortunes, rising by an honest industry to greater estates than those of their elder brothers. It is not improbable but Will was formerly tried at divinity, law, or physic; and that finding his genius did not lie that way, his parents gave him up at length to his own inventions. But certainly, however improper he might have been for studies of a higher nature, he was perfectly well turned for the occupations of trade and commerce. As I think this is a point which cannot be too much inculcated, I shall advise my Reader to compare what I have here written with what I have said in my twenty first Speculation.

No. 110. Friday, July 6.

Horror ubique animos, simul ipsa silentia terrunt.

At a little distance from Sir Roger's house, among the ruins of an old Abby, there is a long walk of aged elms; which are shot up so very high, that when one pauses under them, the roots and crows that rest upon the tops of them seem to be cawing in another region.
gion. I am very much delighted with this sort of noise, which I consider as a kind of natural prayer to that Being who supplies the wants of his whole creation, and who, in the beautiful language of the Psalms, feedeth the young ravens that call upon him. I like this retirement the better, because of an ill report it lieth under of being haunt'd; for which reason (as I have been told in the family) no living creature ever walks in it besides the Chaplain. My good friend the Butler desired me with a very grave face not to venture my self in it after sun-set; for that one of the footmen had been almost frighted out of his wits by a spirit that appeared to him in the shape of a black horse without an head; to which he added, that about a month ago one of the maids coming home late that way with a pail of milk upon her head, heard such a rustling among the bushes that the let it fall.

I was taking a walk in this place last night between the hours of nine and ten, and could not but fancy it one of the most proper scenes in the world for a ghost to appear in. The ruins of the abbey are scattered up and down on every side, and half covered with ivy and elder bushes, the harbours of several solitary birds which seldom make their appearance till the dusk of the evening. The place was formerly a church-yard, and has still several marks in it of graves and burying-places. There is such an echo among the old ruins and vaults, that if you stamp but a little louder than ordinary, you hear the sound repeated. At the same time the walk of elms, with the croaking of the ravens which from time to time are heard from the tops of them, looks exceeding solemn and venerable. These objects naturally raise seriousness and attention: and when night heightens the awfulness of the place, and pours out her supernumerary horrors upon every thing in it, I do not at all wonder that weak minds fill it with spectres and apparitions.

Mr. Locke, in his chapter of the association of ideas, has very curious remarks to shew how by the prejudice of education one idea often introduces into the mind a whole set that bear no resemblance to one another in the nature of things. Among several examples of this kind, he produces the following instance. The ideas of goblins and sprites have really so more to do with darkness than light; yet let but a foolish maid incite these often on the mind of a child, and raise them there together, possibly he shall never be able to separate them again so long as he lives; but darkness shall ever afterward bring with it these frightful ideas, and they shall be so joined, that he can no more bear the one than the other.
As I was walking in this solitude, where the dusk of the evening conspired with so many other occasions of terror, I observed a cow grazing not far from me, which an imagination that is apt to flatter might easily have construed into a black horse without an head: and I dare say the poor footman lost his wits upon some such trivial occasion.

My friend Sir Roger has often told me with a great deal of mirth, that at his first coming to his estate, he found three parts of his house altogether useless; that the best room in it had the reputation of being haunted, and by that means was locked up; that noises had been heard in his long gallery, so that he could not get a servant to enter it after eight-o-clock at night; that the door of one of his chambers was nailed up, because there went a story in the family, that a Butler had formerly hanged himself in it; and that his mother, who lived to a great age, had shut up half the rooms in the house, in which either a husband, a son, or daughter had died. The Knight seeing his habitation reduced to so small a compass, and himself in a manner shut out of his own house, upon the death of his mother ordered all the apartments to be flung open, and exorcised by his Chaplain, who lay in every room one after another, and by that means dissipated the fears which had so long reigned in the family.

I should not have been thus particular upon these ridiculous horrids, did not I find them so very much prevail in all parts of the country. At the same time I think a person who is thus terrified with the imagination of Ghosts and Spectres much more reasonable, than one who contrary to the reports of all Historians sacred and profane, ancient and modern, and to the traditions of all nations, thinks the appearance of Spirits fabulous and groundless. Could not I give my self up to this general testimony of mankind, I should to the relations of particular persons who are now living, and whom I cannot distrust in other matters of fact. I might here add, that not only the Historians, to whom we may join the Poets, but likewise the Philosophers of antiquity have favoured this opnion. Lucretius himself, though by the course of his Philo sophy he was obliged to maintain that the soul did not exist separate from the body, makes no doubt of the reality of apparitions, and that men have ofen appeared after their death. This I think very remarkable; he was so pained with the matter of fact which he could not have the confidence to deny, that he was forced to account for it by one of the most absurd unphilosophical notions that was ever started. He tells us, That the surfaces of all bodies are perpetually flying off from their respective bodies,
bodies, one after another; and that these surfaces or thin cases that included each other whilst they were joined in the body like the coats of an Onion, are sometimes seen entire when they are separated from it; by which means we often behold the shapes and shadows of persons who are either dead or absent.

I shall dismiss this paper with a story out of Josephus, not so much for the sake of the story itself, as for the moral reflection with which the Author concludes it, and which I shall here set down in his own words. *Glaphira the daughter of King Archelaus, after the death of her two first husbands (being married to a third, who was brother to her first husband, and so passionately in love with her that he turned off his former wife to make room for this marriage) had a very odd kind of dream. She fancied that she saw her first husband coming towards her, and that she embraced him with great tenderness; when in the midst of the pleasure which she expressed at the sight of him, he reproached her after the following manner: Glaphira, says he, thou hast made good the old saying, that women are not to be trusted. Was not I the husband of thy virginity? Have I not children by thee? How couldst thou forget our loves so far as to enter into a second marriage, and after that into a third, nay to take for thy husband a man who has so shamelessly crept into the bed of his brother? However, for the sake of our palled loves, I shall free thee from thy present reproach, and make thee mine for ever. Glaphira told this Dream to several women of her acquaintance, and died soon after. I thought this story might not be impertinent in this place, wherein I speak of those Kings: besides that, the example deserves to be taken notice of, as it contains a most certain proof of the Immortality of the Soul, and of divine Providence. If any man thinks these facts incredible, let him enjoy his opinion to himself; but let him not endeavour to disturb the belief of others, who by instances of this nature are excited to the study of Virtue.
The course of my last Speculation led me insensibly into a subject upon which I always meditate with great delight, I mean the Immortality of the Soul. I was yesterday walking alone in one of my friend's woods, and lost my self in it very agreeably, as I was running over in my mind the several arguments that establish this great point, which is the basis of Morality, and the source of all the pleasing hopes and secret joys that can arise in the heart of a reasonable creature: I considered those several proofs drawn,

First, From the nature of the Soul itself, and particularly its Immateriaility: which though not absolutely necessary to the Eternity of its duration, has, I think, been evinced to almost a demonstration.

Secondly, From its Passions and Sentiments, as particularly from its love of existence, its horror of annihilation, and its hopes of immortality, with that secret satisfaction which it finds in the practice of virtue, and that uneasiness which follows in it upon the commission of vice.

Thirdly, From the nature of the supreme Being, whose justice, goodness, wisdom and veracity are all concerned in this great point.

But among these and other excellent arguments for the Immortality of the Soul, there is one drawn from the perpetual progress of the Soul to its perfection, without a possibility of ever arriving at it; which is a hint that I do not remember to have been opened and improved by others who have written on this subject, though it seems to me to carry a great weight with it. How can it enter into the thoughts of men, that the Soul, which is capable of such immense perfections, and of receiving new improvements to all Eternity, shall fall away into nothing almost as soon as it is created? Are such abilities made for no purpose? A brute arrives at a point of perfection that he can never pass: in a few years he has all the endowments he is capable of; and were he to live ten thousand more, would be the same thing he is at present. Were a human Soul thus thus at a stand in her accomplishments, were her faculties to be fully blown, and incapable of further enlargements, I could imagine it might fall away insensibly, and drop at once into a state of annihilation. But can we believe a thinking being that is in a perpetual progress of improvements, and travelling on from perfection to perfection, after having just looked abroad into the works of its Creator, and made a few discoveries of his infinite goodness, wisdom, and power, must perish at her first setting out, and in the very beginning of her enquiries?

A man, considered in his present state, seems only sent into the world to propagate his kind. He provides himself with a successor, and immediately quits his post to make room for him.

_Heredem alterius, velut unda supervenit undam._

He does not seem born to enjoy life, but to deliver it down to others. This is not surprising to consider in animals, which are formed for our use, and can finish their business in a short life. The silk-worm, after having spun her task, lays her eggs and dies. But a man can never have taken in his full measure of knowledge, has not time to subdue his passions, establish his soul in virtue, and come up to the perfection of his nature, before he is hurried off the stage. Would an infinitely wise being make such glorious creatures for so mean a purpose? Can he delight in the production of such abortive intelligences, such short-lived reasonable beings? Would he give us talents that are not to be exerted? Capacities that are never to be gratified? How can we find that wisdom, which shines through all his works, in the formation of man, without looking on this world as only a nursery for the next, and believing that the several generations of rational creatures, which rise up and disappear in such quick successions, are only to receive their rudiments of existence here, and afterwards to be transplanted into a more friendly climate, where they may spread and flourish to all eternity?

There is not, in my opinion, a more pleasing and triumphant consideration in religion, than this of the perpetual progress which the soul makes towards the perfection of its nature, without ever arriving at a period in it. To look upon the soul as going on from strength to strength, to consider that she is to shine for ever with new accessions of glory, and brighten to all eternity; that she will be still adding virtue to virtue, and knowledge to knowledge; carries in it something wonderfully agreeable to that ambition which is natural to the mind of man. Nay, it must be a prospect pleasing to God himself, to see his Creation for ever beautifying in his eyes, and drawing nearer to him, by greater degrees of resemblance.

Methinks this single consideration of the progress of a finite Spirit to perfection, will be sufficient to extinguish all envy in inferior natures, and all contempt in superior. That Cherubim which now appears as a God to a human Soul, knows very well that the period will come about in Eternity, when the human Soul shall be as perfect as he himself now is: nay, when she shall look down upon that degree of perfection, as much as she now falls short of it. It is true, the higher nature still advances; and by that means preserves his distance and superiority in the scale of Being; but he knows, how high soever the station is of which he stands possessed at present, the inferior Nature will at length mount up to it, and shine forth in the same degree of glory.

With what astonishment and veneration may we look into our own Souls, where there are such hidden stores of Virtue and knowledge, such inexhausted sources of perfection? We know not yet what we shall be, nor will it ever enter into the heart of man to conceive the glory that will be always in reserve for him. The Soul considered with its Creator, is like one of those mathematical lines that may draw nearer to another to all Eternity without a possibility of touching it: and can there be a thought so transporting, as to consider ourselves in these perpetual approaches to him, who is not only the standard of perfection, but of happiness!

῾Αλλ’ οὐκ ἐπάθον, ἀλλ’ ἐπώειν, ἤσχος ἐσεῖδενα,

Thuc.

Pyth.

I am always very well pleased with a country Sunday; and think, if keeping holy the seventh day were only a human institution, it would be the best method that could have been thought of for the polishing and civilizing of mankind. It is certain the country-people would soon degrdegenerate into a kind of Savages and Barbarians, were there not such frequent returns of a stated time, in which the whole village meet together with their best faces, and in their cleanliest habits, to converse with one another upon indifferent subjects, hear their duties explained to them, and join together in adoration of the supreme Being. Sunday clears away the rust of the whole week, not only as it refreshes their minds the notions of religion, but as it puts both the sexes upon appearing in their most agreeable forms, and exerting all such qualities as are apt to give them a figure in the eye of the village. A country-fellow distinguishes himself as much in the Church-yard, as a Citizen does upon the Change, the whole parish-polities being generally discussed in that place either after sermon or before the bell rings.

My friend Sir Roger being a good church-man, has beautified the inside of his church with several texts of his own choosing: He has likewise given a handsome pulpit-cloth, and railed in the communion-table at his own expense. He has often told me, that at his coming to his estate he found his parishioners very irregular; and that in order to make them kneel and join in the responses, he gave every one of them a half-crown and a common-prayer-book; and at the same time employed an itinerant singing-master, who goes about the country for that purpose, to instruct them rightly in the tunes of the Psalms; upon which they now very much value themselves, and indeed out-do most of the country churches that I have ever heard.

As Sir Roger is landlord to the whole congregation, he keeps them in very good order, and will suffer no body to sleep in it besides himself; for if by chance he has been surprized into a short nap at sermon upon recovering out of it he stands up and looks about him, and if he sees any body else nodding, either wakes them himself, or sends his servant to them. Several of the old Knight's particularities break out upon these occasions: Sometimes he will be lengthening out a verse in the singing-psalms, half a minute after the rest of the congregation have done with it; sometimes, when he is pleased with the matter of his devotion, he pronounces Amen three or four times to the same prayer; and sometimes stands up when every body else is upon their knees, to count the congregation, or see if any of his Tenants are missing.

I was yesterday very much surprized to hear my old friend, in the midst of the service, calling out to one John Matthews to mind what he was about, and not disturb the congregation. This John Matthews it seems is remarkable for being an idle fellow, and at that time was kicking his heels for his diversion. This authority of the Knight, though exerted in that odd manner which accompanies him in all circumstances of life, has a very good effect upon the parish, who are not polite enough to see any thing ridiculous in his behaviour; besides that the general good sense and worthiness of his character, make his friends observe these little singularities as foils that rather set off than blemish his good qualities.

As soon as the sermon is finished, no body presumes to stir till Sir Roger is gone out of the church. The Knight walks down from his seat in the chancel between a double row of his tenants, that stand bowing to him on each side; and every now and then enquires how such an one’s wife, or mother, or son, or father do, whom he does not see at church; which is understood as a secret reprimand to the person that is absent.

The Chaplain has often told me, that upon a catechising-day, when Sir Roger has been pleased with a boy that answers well, he has ordered a bible to be given him next day for his encouragement; and sometimes accompanies it with a fitch of bacon to his mother. Sir Roger has likewise added five pounds a year to the Clerk’s place; and that he may encourage the young fellows to make themselves perfect in the church-service, has promised upon the death of the present incumbent, who is very old, to befall it according to merit.

The fair understanding between Sir Roger and his Chaplain, and their mutual concurrence in doing good, is the more remarkable, because the very next village is famous for the differences and contentions that rife between the Parson and the Squire, who live in a perpetual state of war. The Parson is always preaching at the Squire, and the Squire to be revenged on the Parson, never comes to church. The Squire has made all his tenants atheists and tithe-filers; while the Parson instructs them every Sunday in the dignity of his order, and inculcates to them almost in every sermon, that he is a better man than his Patron. In short, matters are come to such an extremity, that the Squire has not paid his prayers either in publick or private this half year; and that the Parson threatens him, if he does not mend his manners, to pray for him in the face of the whole congregation.

Feuds of this nature, though too frequent in the country, are very fatal to the ordinary people; who are so used to be dazzled with riches, that they pay as much deference to the understanding of a man of an estate, as of a man of learning; and are very hardly brought to regard any truth; how important soever it may be, that is preached to them, when they know there are several men of five hundred a year who do not believe it.

Thurf.
Bodily labour is of two kinds, either that which a man submits to for his livelihood, or that which he undergoes for his pleasure. The latter of them generally changes the name of Labour for that of Exercise, but differs only from ordinary labour as it rises from another motive.

A country life abounds in both these kinds of labour, and for that reason gives a man a greater stock of health, and consequently a more perfect enjoyment of himself, than any other way of life. I consider the body as a system of tubes and glands, or to use a more rustic phrase, a bundle of pipes and strainers, fitted to one another after so wonderful a manner as to make a proper engine for the soul to work with. This description does not only comprehend the bowels, bones, tendons, veins, nerves and arteries, but every muscle and every ligature, which is a composition of fibres, that are so many imperceptible tubes or pipes interwoven on all sides with invisible glands or strainers.

This general idea of a humane body, without considering it in the niceties of anatomy, lets us see how absolutely necessary Labour is for the right preservation of it. There must be frequent motions and agitations, to mix, digest, and separate the juices contained in it, as well as to clear and cleanse that infinitude of pipes and strainers of which it is composed, and to give their solid parts a more firm and lasting tone. Labour or Exercise ferments the humours, casts them into their proper channels, throws off redundancies, and helps Nature in those secret distributions without which the body cannot subsist in its vigour, nor the soul act with cheerfulness.

I might here mention the effects which this has upon all the faculties of the mind, by keeping the understanding clear, the imagination untroubled, and refining those spirits that are necessary for the proper exertion of our intellectual faculties, during the present laws of union between tween soul and body. It is to a neglect in this particular that we must ascribe the spleen, which is so frequent in men of studious and sedentary tempers, as well as the vapours to which those of the other sex are so often subject.

Had not Exercise been absolutely necessary for our well-being, nature would not have made the body so proper for it, by giving such an activity to the limbs, and such a pliancy to every part as necessarily produces those compressions, exertions, contortions, dilatations, and all other kinds of motions that are necessary for the preservation of such a system of tubes and glands as has been before mentioned. And that we might not want inducements to engage us in such an exercise of the body as is proper for its welfare, it is so ordered that nothing valuable can be procured without it. Not to mention riches and honour, even food and raiment are not to be come at without the toil of the hands and sweat of the brows. Providence furnishes materials, but expects that we should work them up ourselves. The Earth must be laboured before it gives its encrease, and when it is forced into its several products, how many hands must they pass through before they are fit for use? Manufactures, trade, and agriculture, naturally employ more than nineteen parts of the species in twenty, and as for those who are not obliged to labour, by the condition in which they are born, they are more miserable than the rest of mankind, unless they indulge themselves in that voluntary labour which goes by the name of Exercise.

My friend Sir Roger has been an indefatigable man in business of this kind, and has hung several parts of his house with the trophies of his former labours. The walls of his great hall are covered with the horns of several kinds of Deer that he has killed in the chase, which he thinks the most valuable furniture of his house, as they afford him frequent topicks of discourse, and shew that he has not been idle. At the lower end of the hall is a large Otter's skin stuffed with hay, which his mother ordered to be hung up in that manner, and the Knight looks upon with great satisfaction, because it seems he was but nine years old when his dog killed him. A little room adjoining to the hall is a kind of Arsenal filled with guns of several sizes and inventions, with which the Knight has made great havoc in the woods, and destroyed many thousands of pheasants, partridges and wood-cocks. His stable doors are patched with notes that belonged to Foxes of the Knight's own hunting down. Sir Roger shewed me one of them that for distinction sake has a brass nail struck through it, which cost him about fifteen hours riding, riding, carried him through half a dozen counties, killed him a brace of geldings, and left above half his dogs. This the Knight looks upon as one of the greatest exploits of his life. The p eruflie widow, whom I have given some account of, was the death of several foxes; for Sir Roger has told me that in the course of his amours he patched the western door of his stable. Whenever the widow was cruel, the foxes were sure to pay for it. In proportion as his passion for the widow abated, and old age came on, he left his Fox-hunting; but a Hare is not yet safe that fits within ten miles of his house.

There is no kind of exercise which I would so recommend to my Readers of both sexes as this of riding, as there is none which so much conduces to health, and is every way accommodated to the body, according to the idea which I have given of it. Doctor Sydenham is very lavish in its praises; and if the English Reader would see the mechanical effects of it described at length, he may find them in a book published not many years since, under the title of the Medicina Gymnastica. For my own part, when I am in town, for want of these opportunities, I exercise my self an hour every morning upon a dumb bell that is placed in a corner of a room, and pleases me the more because it does every thing I require of it in the most profound silence. My landlady and her daughters are so well acquainted with my hours of exercise, that they never come into my room to disturb me whilst I am ringing.

When I was some years younger than I am at present, I used to employ my self in a more laborious diversion, which I learned from a Latin treatise of exercises, that is written with great erudition: It is there called the muscius, or the fighting with a man's own shadow; and consists in the brandishing of two short sticks grasped in each hand, and loaded with plugs of lead at either end. This opens the chest, exercises the limbs, and gives a man all the pleasure of boxing, without the blows. I could wish that several learned men would lay out that time which they employ in controversies and disputes about nothing, in this Method of fighting with their own shadows. It might conduces very much to evaporate the spleen, which makes them unease to the publick as well as to themselves.

To conclude, as I am a compound of soul and body, I consider my self as obliged to a double scheme of duties; and I think I have not fulfilled the business of the day, when I do not thus employ the one in labour and exercise, as well as the other in study and contemplation.

Saturday.
N° 117. Saturday, July 14.

Ipse sibi somnia singunt.                 Virg.

THERE are some opinions in which a man should stand neuter, without engaging his affections to one side or the other. Such a hovering faith as this, which refuses to settle upon any determination, is absolutely necessary in a mind that is careful to avoid errors and prepossession. When the arguments press equally on both sides in matters that are indifferent to us, the safest method is to give up our selves to neither.

It is with this temper of mind that I consider the subject of Witchcraft. When I hear the relations that are made from all parts of the world, not only from Norway and Lapland, from the East and West-Indies, but from every particular nation in Europe, I cannot forbear thinking that there is such an intercourse and commerce with evil Spirits, as that which we express by the name of Witchcraft. But when I consider that the ignorant and credulous parts of the world abound most in these relations, and that the persons among us who are supposed to engage in such an infernal commerce, are people of a weak understanding and crazed imagination, and at the same time reflect upon the many impostures and delusions of this nature that have been detected in all ages, I endeavour to suspend my belief till I hear more certain accounts than any which have yet come to my knowledge. In short, when I consider the question, Whether there are such persons in the world as those we call Witches? my mind is divided between two opposite opinions; rather (to speak my thoughts freely) I believe in general that there is, and has been, such a thing as Witchcraft; but at the same time can give no credit to any particular instance of it.

I am engaged in this Speculation, by some occurrences that I met with yesterday, which I shall give my Reader an account of at large. As I was walking with my friend Sir Roger by the side of one of his woods, an old woman applied herself to me for my charity. Her dress and figure put me in mind of the following description in Ortony.

In a close lane as I pursued my journey,
I spy'd a wrinkled Hag, with age grown double,
Picking dry sticks, and mumbling to herself.
Her eyes with scalding rheum were galled and red;
Cold palsy shook her head; her hands seemed wither'd;
And on her crooked shoulders had she wrapp'd
The tattered remnants of an old striped hanging,
Which serv'd to keep her carcases from the cold.
So there was nothing of a piece about her.
Her lower weeds were all her coarsest patch'd
With different colour'd rags, black, red, white, yellow,
And seem'd to speak variety of wretchedness.

As I was musing on this description, and comparing it with the object before me, the Knight told me, that this very old woman had the reputation of a Witch all over the country, that her lips were observed to be always in motion, and that there was not a witch about her house which her neighbours did not believe had carried her several hundreds of miles. If the chance to stumble, they always found sticks or straws that lay in the figure of a Crown before her. If she made any mistake at church, and cried Amen in a wrong place, they never failed to conclude that she was laying her prayers backwards. There was not a Maid in the parish that would take a pin of her, though she should offer a bag of money with it. She goes by the name of Moll White, and has made the country ring with several imaginary exploits which are palmed upon her. If the dairy-maid does not make her butter to come so soon as she would have it, Moll White is at the bottom of the churn. If a horse sweats in the stable, Moll White has been upon his back. If a hare makes an unexpected escape from the hounds, the Huntsman curses Moll White. Nay, (says Sir Roger) I have known the Master of the pack, upon such an occasion, fend one of his servants to see if Moll White had been out that morning.

This account raised my curiosity so far, that I begged my friend Sir Roger to go with me into her hovel, which stood in a solitary corner under the side of the wood. Upon our first entering Sir Roger winked to me, and pointed at something that stood behind the door, which upon looking that way I found to be an old broomstaff. At the same time

time he whispered me in the ear to take notice of a Tabby cat that sat in the chimney-corner, which, as the Knight told me, lay under as bad a report as Moll White her self; for besides that Moll is said often to accompany her in the same shape, the Cat is reported to have spoken twice or thrice in her life, and to have played several pranks above the capacity of an ordinary Cat.

I was secretly concerned to see humane nature in so much wretchdeats and disgrace, but at the same time could not forbear smiling to hear Sir Roger, who is a little puzzled about the old woman, advising her as a Justice of Peace to avoid all communication with the Devil, and never to hurt any of her neighbours cattle. We concluded our visit with a bounty, which was very acceptable.

In our return home Sir Roger told me that old Moll had been often brought before him for making children spit pins, and giving maids the night-mare; and that the country people would be toasting her into a pond and trying experiments with her every day, if it was not for him and his Chaplain.

I have since found, upon enquiry, that Sir Roger was several times flagged with the reports that had been brought him concerning this old woman, and would frequently have bound her over to the County Sessions, had not his Chaplain with much ado persuaded him to the contrary.

I have been the more particular in this account, because I hear there is fearce a village in England that has not a Moll White in it. When an old woman begins to doat, and grow chargeable to a parish, she is generally turned into a Witch, and fills the whole country with extravagant fancies, imaginary dittymongers, and terrifying dreams. In the mean time the poor wretch that is the innocent occasion of so many evils, begins to be frighted at her self, and sometimes confesses secret commerce and familiarities that her imagination forms in a delirious old age. This frequently cuts off Charity from the greatest objects of compassion, and inspires people with a malevolence towards those poor decrepit parts of our species, in whom human nature is defaced by infirmity and dotage.
The first and most obvious reflections which arise in a man who changes the city for the country, are upon the different manners of the people whom he meets with in those two different scenes of life. By manners I do not mean morals, but behaviour and good breeding, as they shew themselves in the town and in the country.

And here, in the first place, I must observe a very great revolution that has happened in this article of good breeding. Several obliging deferences, concessions and submissions, with many outward forms and ceremonies that accompany them, were first of all brought up among the polite part of mankind, who lived in courts and cities, and distinguished themselves from the rustic part of the species (who on all occasions acted bluntly and naturally) by such a mutual complaisance and intercourse of civilities. These forms of conversation by degrees multiplied and grew troublesome; the modern world found too great a constraint in them, and have therefore thrown most of them aside. Conversation, like the Roman religion, was so encumbered with show and ceremony, that it stood in need of a reformation to retrench its superfluities, and restore it to its natural good sense and beauty. At present therefore an unconstrained carriage, and a certain openness of behaviour, are the height of good breeding. The fashionable world is grown free and easy; our manners fit more loose upon us: nothing is so modish as an agreeable negligence. In a word, good breeding shews it self most, where to an ordinary eye it appears the least.

If after this we look on the people of mode in the country, we find in them the manners of the last age. They have no sooner fetched themselves up to the fashion of the polite world, but the town has dropped them, and are nearer to the first state of nature, than to those refinements which formerly reigned in the courts, and still prevail in the country.
One may now know a man that never conversed in the world by his excesses of good breeding. A polite country Squire shall make you as many bows in half an hour, as would serve a Courter for a week. There is infinitely more to do about place and precedence in a meeting of Juftices wives, than in an assembly of Dutchessies.

This rural politenesse is very troublesome to a man of my temper, who generally take the chair that is next me, and walk first or last, in the front or in the rear, as chance directs. I have known my friend Sir Roger's dinner almost cold before the company could adjust the ceremonial, and be prevailed upon to sit down; and have heartily pitied my old friend, when I have seen him forced to pick and pull his guests, as they sat at the several parts of his table, that he might drink their healths according to their respective ranks and qualities. Honest Will Wimble, who I should have thought had been altogether uninfected with ceremony, gives me abundance of trouble in this particular. Though he has been fishing all the morning, he will not help himself at dinner 'till I am served. When we are going out of the hall, he runs behind me; and last night, as we were walking in the fields, stopped short at a little 'till I came up to it, and upon my making signs to him to get over, told me, with a serious smile, that 'twas his belief they had no manners in the country.

There has happened another revolution in the point of good breeding, which relates to the conversation among men of mode, and which I cannot but look upon as very extraordinary. It was certainly one of the first distinctions of a well-bred man, to express everything that had the most remote appearance of being obscene, in modest terms and distant phrases; whilst the clown, who had no such delicacy of conception and expression, clothed his ideas in those plain homely terms that are the most obvious and natural. This kind of good manners was perhaps carried to an excess, so as to make conversation too stiff, formal, and precise; for which reason (as hypocrisy in one age is generally succeeded by atheism in another) conversation is in a great measure relapsed into the first extremity; so that at present several of our men of the town, and particularly those who have been polished in France, make use of the most coarse uncivilized words in our language, and utter themselves often in such a manner as a clown would blush to hear.

This infamous piece of good-breeding, which reigns among the coxcombs of the town, has not yet made its way into the country; and as it is impossible for such an irrational way of conversation to last long among mong a people that makes any profession of religion, or show of modesty, if the country Gentlemen get into it, they will certainly be left in the lurch. Their good-breeding will come too late to them, and they will be thought a parcel of lewd clowns, while they fancy themselves talking together like men of wit and pleasure.

As the two points of good breeding, which I have hitherto insisted upon, regard behaviour and conversation, there is a third which turns upon drees. In this too the country are very much behind hand. The rural Beaus are not yet got out of the fashion that took place at the time of the Revolution, but ride about the country in red coats and laced hats, while the women in many parts are still trying to outvie one another in the height of their head-dresses.

But a friend of mine, who is now upon the western circuit, having promised to give me an account of the several modes and fashions that prevail in the different parts of the nation through which he passes, I shall defer the enlarging upon this last topic till I have received a letter from him, which I expect every post.

N° 120. Wednesday, July 18.

Equivem crede, quia sit divinitus illis

Ingenium:

Virg.

My friend Sir Roger is very often merry with me, upon my passing so much of my time among his poultry: he has caught me twice or thrice looking after a bird’s nest, and several times sitting an hour or two together near an hen and c hicken. He tells me he believes I am personally acquainted with every fowl about his house; calls such a particular cock my favourite, and frequently complains that his ducks and geese have more of my company than himself.

I must confess I am infinitely delighted with those speculations of nature which are to be made in a country-life; and as my reading has very much lain among books of natural history, I cannot forbear recollecting upon upon this occasion the several remarks which I have met with in Authors; and comparing them with what falls under my own observation: the arguments for Providence drawn from the natural history of animals being in my opinion demonstrative.

The make of every kind of animal is different from that of every other kind; and yet there is not the least turn in the muscles or twist in the fibres of any one, which does not render them more proper for that particular animal's way of life than any other cast or texture of them would have been.

The most violent appetites in all creatures are Lust and Hunger: the first is a perpetual call upon them to propagate their kind; the latter, to preserve themselves.

It is astonishing to consider the different degrees of care that descend from the parent to the young, so far as is absolutely necessary for the leaving a posterity. Some creatures cast their eggs as chance directs them, and think of them no farther, as insects and several kinds of fish: others of a nicer frame, find out proper beds to deposite them in, and there leave them; as the Serpent, the Crocodile, and Ostrich: others hatch their eggs and tend the birth, till it is able to shift for itself.

What can we call the principle which directs every different kind of bird to observe a particular plan in the structure of its nest, and directs all of the same species to work after the same model? It cannot be Imitation; for though you hatch a Crow under a Hen, and never let it see any of the works of its own kind, the nest it makes shall be the same, to the laying of a chick, with all the other nests of the same species. It cannot be Reason; for were animals induced with it to as great a degree as man, their buildings would be as different as ours, according to the different conveniences that they would propose to themselves.

Is it not remarkable, that the same temper of weather which raises this genial warmth in animals, should cover the trees with leaves, and the fields with grass, for their security and concealment, and produce such infinite swarms of insects for the support and sustenance of their respective broods?

Is it not wonderful, that the love of the parent should be so violent while it lasts; and that it should last no longer than is necessary for the preservation of the young?

The violence of this natural love is exemplified by a very barbarous experiment, which I shall quote at length as I find it in an excellent Author, and hope my Readers will pardon the mentioning such an instance flance of cruelty, because there is nothing can so effectually show the strength of that principle in animals, of which I am here speaking. “A person who was well skilled in dissections opened a bitch, and as she lay in the most exquisite tortures, offered her one of her young puppies, which she immediately fell a licking; and for the time seemed insensible of her own pain: on the removal, she kept her eyes fixt on it, and began a waiting for its cry, which seemed rather to proceed from the lots of her young one, than the sense of her own torments.

But notwithstanding this natural love in brutes is much more violent and intense than in rational creatures, Providence has taken care that it should be no longer troublesome to the parent than it is useful to the young; for so soon as the wants of the latter cease, the mother withdraws her fondness, and leaves them to provide for themselves; and what is a very remarkable circumstance in this part of instinct, we find that the love of the parent may be lengthened out beyond its usual time, if the preservation of the species requires it; as we may see in birds that drive away their young as soon as they are able to get their livelihood, but continue to feed them if they are tied to the nest, or confined within a cage, or by any other means appear to be out of a condition of supplying their own necessities.

This natural love is not observed in animals to ascend from the young to the parent, which is not at all necessary for the continuance of the species: nor indeed in reasonable creatures does it rise in any proportion, as it spreads itself downwards; for in all family affection, we find protection granted and favours bestowed, are greater motives to love and tenderness than safety, benefits, or life received.

One would wonder to hear sceptical men disputing for the Reason of animals, and telling us it is only our pride and prejudices that will not allow them the use of that faculty.

Reason shews it fell in all occurrences of life; whereas the brute makes no discovery of such a talent, but in what immediately regards his own preservation, or the continuance of his species. Animals in their generation are wiser than the sons of men; but their wisdom is confined to a few particulars, and lies in a very narrow compass. Take a brute out of his instinct, and you find him wholly deprived of understanding. To use an instance that comes often under observation.

With what caution does the hen provide her self a nest in places unfrequented, and free from noise and disturbance? When she has laid her eggs in such a manner that she can cover them, what care does she take in turning them frequently, that all parts may partake of the vital warmth? When she leaves them to provide for her necessary sustenance, how punctually does she return before they have time to cool, and become incapable of producing an animal? In the summer you see her giving herself greater freedom, and quitting her care for above two hours together; but in winter, when the rigor of the season would chill the principles of life, and destroy the young one, she grows more affidious in her attendance, and stays away but half the time. When the birth approaches, with how much nicety and attention does she help the chick to break its prison? Not to take notice of her covering it from the injuries of the weather, providing it proper nourishment, and teaching it to help itself; nor to mention her forsaking the nest, if after the usual time of reckoning the young one does not make its appearance. A Chymial operation could not be followed with greater art or diligence, than is seen in the hatching of a chick; though there are many other birds that shew an infinitely greater sagacity in all the forementioned particulars.

But at the same time the hen, that has all this seeming ingenuity, (which is indeed absolutely necessary for the propagation of the species) considered in other respects, is without the least glimmerings of thought or common sense. She mistakes a piece of chalk for an egg, and sits upon it in the same manner: she is insensible of an increase or diminution in the number of those she lays; she does not distinguish between her own and those of another species; and when the birth appears of never so different a bird, will cherish it for her own. In all these circumstances, which do not carry an immediate regard to the subsistence of her self or her species, she is a very idiot.

There is not in my opinion any thing more mysterious in nature than this instinct in Animals, which thus rises above Reason, and falls infinitely short of it. It cannot be accounted for by any properties in matter, and at the same time works after so odd a manner, that one cannot think it the faculty of an intellectual Being. For my own part, I look upon it as upon the principle of gravitation in bodies, which is not to be explained by any known qualities inherent in the bodies themselves, nor from any laws of mechanism, but according to the best notions of the greatest Philosophers, is an immediate impression from the first mover, and the Divine energy acting in the creatures.
AS I was walking this morning in the great yard that belongs to my friend's country house, I was wonderfully pleased to see the different workings of Inseinct in a Hen followed by a brood of Ducks. The young, upon the flight of a pond, immediately ran into it; while the step-mother, with all imaginable anxiety, hovered about the borders of it, to call them out of an element that appeared to her so dangerous and destructive. As the different principle which acted in these different animals cannot be termed Reason, so when we call it Inseinct, we mean something we have no knowledge of. To me, as I hinted in my last paper, it seems the immediate direction of Providence, and such an operation of the supreme Being, as that which determines all the portions of matter to their proper centres. A modern Philosopher, quoted by Monsieur Bayle in his learned dissertation on the Souls of brutes, delivers the same opinion, though in a bolder form of words, where he says, Deus est anima brutorum, God himself is the Soul of brutes. Who can tell what to call that seeming sagacity in Animals, which directs them to such food as is proper for them, and makes them naturally avoid whatever is noxious or unwholesome? Tully has observed that a Lamb no sooner falls from its mother, but immediately and of its own accord applies itself to the teat. Dampier, in his travels, tells us, that when men are thrown upon any of the unknown coasts of America, they never venture upon the fruit of any tree, how tempting soever it may appear, unless they observe that it is marked with the pecking of birds; but fall on without any fear or apprehension where the birds have been before them.

But notwithstanding Animals have nothing like the use of Reason, we find in them all the lower parts of our nature, the passions and affections in their greatest strength and perfection. And here it is worth our observation, that all beasts and birds of prey are wonderfully subject to anger, malice, revenge, and all other violent passions that may animate them.
in search of their proper food; as those that are incapable of defending themselves, or annoying others, or whose safety lies chiefly in their flight, are supine, fearful, and apprehensive of everything they see or hear; whilst others that are of affability and use to man, have their natures softened with something mild and tractable, and by that means are qualified for a domestic life. In this case the passions generally correspond with the make of the body. We do not find the fury of a Lion in so weak and defenceless an animal as a Lamb, nor the meekness of a Lamb in a creature so armed for battle and assault as the Lion. In the same manner, we find that particular animals have a more or less exquisite sharpness and sagacity in those particular senses which most turn to their advantage, and in which their safety and welfare is the most concerned.

Nor must we here omit that great variety of arms with which nature has differently fortified the bodies of several kinds of animals, such as claws, hoofs and horns, teeth and tusks, a tail, a fling, a trunk, or a Proboscis. It is likewise observed by Naturalists, that it must be some hidden principle, distinct from what we call Reason, which instructs animals, in the use of these their arms, and teaches them to manage them to the best advantage; because they naturally defend themselves with that part in which their strength lies, before the weapon be formed in it; as is remarkable in Lambs, which though they are bred within doors, and never saw the actions of their own species, push at those who approach them with their foreheads, before the first budding of a horn appears.

I shall add to these general observations, an instance which Mr. Locke has given us of Providence, even in the imperfections of a creature which seems the meanest and most despicable in the whole animal world. He may, says he, from the make of an Oyster, or Cockle, conclude, that it has not so many nor so quick senses as a man, or several other animals: nor if it had, would it in that state and incapacity of transferring it self from one place to another, be bettered by them. What good would flight and bearing do to a creature, that cannot move it self to, or from the object, wherein at a distance it perceives good or evil? And would not quickness of sensation be an inconvenience to an animal, that must be still where chance has once placed it; and where receive the afflux of colder or warmer, clean or foul water, as it happens to come to it?

I shall add to this instance out of Mr. Locke, another out of the learned Dr. Moer, who cites it from Cardan, in relation to another animal which Providence has left defective, but at the same time has shewn its wisdom in the formation of that organ in which it seems chiefly to have failed. What is more obvious and ordinary than a Mole? and yet what more palpable argument of Providence than she? the members of her body are so exactly fitted to her nature and manner of life: for her dwelling being under ground where nothing is to be seen, nature has so obiously fitted her with eyes, that Naturalists can scarce agree whether she have any sight at all or no. But for amends, what she is capable of for her defence and warning of danger, she has very eminently conferred upon her; for she is exceeding quick of hearing. And then her short tail and short legs, but broad fore-feet armed with sharp claws, she go by the event to what purpose they are, she so swifly working her self under ground, and making her way so fast in the earth, as they that behold it cannot but admire it. Her legs therefore are short, that she need dig no more than will serve the meer thickness of her body; and her fore-feet are broad that she may scoop away much earth at a time; and little or no tail she has, because she courses it not on the ground, like the rat or mouse, of whose kindred she is, but lives under the earth, and is fm to dig her self a dwelling there. And she making her way through so thick an element, which will not yield easily, as the air or the water, it had been dangerous to have drawn so long a train behind her; for her enemy might fall upon her rear, and fetch her out before she had compleated or got full possession of her works.

I cannot forbear mentioning Mr. Boyle's remark upon this last creature, who, I remember, somewhere in his works observes, that though the Mole be not totally blind (as it is commonly thought) she has not sight enough to dilliugue particular objects. Her eye is said to have but one humour in it, which is supposed to give her the idea of light, but of nothing else, and is so formed that this idea is probably painful to the animal. Whenever she comes up into broad day she might be in danger of being taken, unless she were thus affected by a light striking upon her eye, and immediately warning her to bury her self in her proper element. More sight would be useles to her, as none at all might be fatal.

I have only inflamed such animals as seem the most imperfect works of nature; and if Providence shews it self even in the blemishes of these creatures, how much more does it discover it self in the several endowments which it has variously bestowed upon such creatures as are more or less finilh and compleated in their several faculties, according to the condition of life in which they are posset?
If several writers among them took each his particular species, and gave us a distinct account of its original, birth, and education; its policies, hostilities and alliances, with the frame and texture of its inward and outward parts, and particularly those that distinguish it from all other animals, with their peculiar aptitudes for the state of being in which Providence has placed them, it would be one of the best services their studies could do mankind, and not a little redound to the glory of the all-wise contriver.

It is true, such a natural history, after all the disquisitions of the learned, would be infinitely short and defective. Seas and deserts hide millions of animals from our observation. Innumerable artifices and stratagems are acted in the bowing wilderness and in the great deep, that can never come to our knowledge. Besides that there are infinitely more species of creatures which are not to be seen without, nor indeed with the help of the finest glasses, than of such as are bulky enough for the naked eye to take hold of. However, from the consideration of such animals as lie within the compass of our knowledge, we might easily form a conclusion of the rest, that the same variety of wisdom and goodness runs through the whole creation, and puts every creature in a condition to provide for its safety and subsistence in its proper station.

Tully has given us an admirable sketch of natural history, in his second book, concerning the nature of the Gods; and that in a style so raised by metaphors and descriptions, that it lifts the subject above raillery and ridicule, which frequently fall on such nice observations, when they pass through the hands of an ordinary writer.

A man's first care should be to avoid the reproaches of his own heart; his next, to escape the centures of the world: if the last interferes with the former, it ought to be entirely neglected; but otherwise there cannot be a greater satisfaction to an honest mind, than to see those approbations which it gives it self seconded by the applauses of the publick: A man is more sure of his conduct, when the verdict which he passes upon his own behaviour is thus warranted and confirmed by the opinion of all that know him.

My worthy friend Sir Roger is one of those who is not only at peace within himself, but beloved and esteemed by all about him. He receives a suitable tribute for his universal benevolence to mankind, in the returns of affection and good-will, which are paid him by every one that lives within his neighbourhood. I lately met with two or three odd in-fiances of that general respect which is shown to the good old Knight.
He would needs carry Will Wimble and myself with him to the country-affizes: as we were upon the road, Will Wimble joined a couple of plain men who ride before us, and conversed with them for some time; during which my friend Sir Roger acquainted me with their characters.

The first of them, says he, that has a spaniel by his side, is a Yeoman of about an hundred pounds a year, an honest man: he is just within the game set, and qualified to kill an hare or a pheasant: He knocks down a dinner with his gun twice or thrice a week; and by that means lives much cheaper than those who have not so good an estate as himself. He would be a good neighbour if he did not destroy so many partridges:
in short, he is a very sensible man; shoots flying; and has been several times Fore-man of the Petty-jury.

The other that rides along with him is Tom Touchy, a fellow famous for taking the law of every body. There is not one in the town where he lives that he has not sued at a Quarter-sessions. The rogue had once the impudence to go to law with the Widow. His head is full of cols, damages and ejectments: he plagued a couple of honest Gentlemen so long for a trespass in breaking one of his hedges, till he was forced to fell the ground it enclosed to defray the charges of the prosecution: his father left him four hundred pounds a year; but he has cast and been cast so often, that he is not now worth thirty. I suppose he is going upon the old business of the willow-tree.

As Sir Roger was giving me this account of Tom Touchy, Will Wim-bble and his two companions stopped short till we came up to them. Af-ther having paid their respects to Sir Roger, Will told him that Mr. Touchey and he must appeal to him upon a dispute that arose between them.
Will it seems had been giving his fellow-travellers an account of his anging one day in such a hole; when Tom Touchy, instead of hearing out his story, told him, that Mr. such an one, if he pleased, might take the law
aw of him for fishing in that part of the river. My friend Sir Roger heard them both, upon a round trot, and after having paused some time told them, with an air of a man who would not give his judgment rashly, that much might be said on both sides. They were neither of them dissatisfied with the Knight's determination, because neither of them found himself in the wrong by it: upon which we made the best of our way to the Assizes.

The Court was at last before Sir Roger came; but notwithstanding all the Justices had taken their places upon the Bench, they made room for the old Knight at the head of them; who for his reputation in the country took occasion to whisper in the Judge's ear, that he was glad his Lordship had met with so much good weather in his circuit. I was listening to the proceedings of the Court with much attention, and infinitely pleased with that great appearance and solemnity which so properly accompanies such a publick administration of our laws; when about an hour's sitting, I observed to my great surprize, in the midst of a trial, that my friend Sir Roger was getting up to speak. I was in some pain for him, till I found he had acquitted himself of two or three sentences; with a look of much business and great intrepidity.

Upon his first rising the Court was hushed, and a general whisper ran among the country-people that Sir Roger was up. The speech he made was so little to the purpose, that I shall not trouble my Readers with an account of it; and I believe was not so much designed by the Knight himself to inform the Court, as to give him a figure in my eye, and keep up his credit in the country.

I was highly delighted, when the Court rose, to see the Gentlemen of the country gathering about my old friend, and striving who should compliment him most; at the same time that the ordinary people gazed upon him at a distance, not a little admiring his courage, that was not afraid to speak to the Judge.

In our return home we met with a very odd accident; which I cannot forbear relating, because it shews how desirous all who know Sir Roger are of giving him marks of their esteem. When we were arrived upon the verge of his estate, we stopped at a little Inn to rest our selves and our horses. The man of the house had it seems been formerly a servant in the Knight's family; and to do honour to his old master, had some time since, unknown to Sir Roger, put him up in a sign-post before the door; so that the Knight's head had hung out upon the road about a week before he himself knew any thing of the matter. As soon as Sir
Sir Roger was acquainted with it, finding that his servant's indiscretion proceeded wholly from affectation and good will, he only told him that he had made him too high a compliment; and when the fellow seemed to think that could hardly be, added with a more decisive look, that it was too great an honour for any man under a Duke; but told him at the same time that it might be altered with a very few touches, and that he himself would be the charge of it. Accordingly they got a painter by the Knight's directions to add a pair of whiskers to the face, and by a little aggravation of the features to change it into the Saracen's head. I should not have known this story, had not the Inn-keeper upon Sir Roger's alighting told him in my hearing, that his Honour's head was brought back last night with the alterations that he had ordered to be made in it. Upon this my friend with his usual cheerfulness related the particulars above-mentioned, and ordered the head to be brought into the room. I could not forbear discovering greater expressions of mirth than ordinary upon the appearance of this monstrous face, under which notwithstanding it was made to frown and glare in a most extraordinary manner, I could still discover a distant resemblance of my old friend. Sir Roger, upon seeing me laugh, desired me to tell him truly if I thought it possible for people to know him in that disguise. I at first kept my usual silence; but upon the Knight's conjuring me to tell him whether it was not still more like himself than a Saracen, I compos'd my countenance in the best manner I could, and replied, That much might be said on both sides.

These several adventures, with the Knight's behaviour in them, gave me as pleasant a day as ever I met with in any of my travels.
As I was yesterday taking the air with my friend Sir Roger, we were met by a fresh-coloured ruddy young man, who rid by us full speed, with a couple of servants behind him. Upon my enquiry who he was, Sir Roger told me that he was a young Gentleman of a considerable estate, who had been educated by a tender mother that lived not many miles from the place where we were. She is a very good Lady, says my friend, but took so much care of her son’s health, that she has made him good for nothing. She quickly found that reading was bad for his eyes, and that writing made his head ache. He was let loose among the woods as soon as he was able to ride on horseback, or to carry a gun upon his shoulder. To be brief, I found, by my friend’s account of him, that he had got a great flock of health, but nothing else; and that if it were a man’s business only to live, there would not be a more accomplished young fellow in the whole county.

The truth of it is, since my residing in these parts, I have seen and heard innumerable instances of young heirs and elder brothers, who either from their own reflecting upon the estates they are born to, and therefore thinking all other accomplishments unnecessary, or from hearing these notions frequently inculcated to them by the flattery of their servants and domesticks, or from the same foolish thoughts prevailing in those who have the care of their education, are of no manner of use but to keep up their families, and transmit their lands and house in a line to posterity.

This makes me often think on a story I have heard of two friends, which I shall give my Reader at large, under feigned names. The moral ral of it may, I hope, be useful, though there are some circumstances which make it rather appear like a Novel, than a true story.

_Eudoxus_ and _Leontine_ began the world with small estate. They were both of them men of good sense and great virtue. They prosecuted their studies together in their earlier years, and entered into such a friendship as lasted to the end of their lives. _Eudoxus_, at his first setting out into the world, threw himself into a Court, where by his natural endowments and his acquired abilities he made his way from one post to another, till at length he had raised a very considerable fortune. _Leontine_, on the contrary, sought all opportunities of improving his mind by study, conversation, and travel. He was not only acquainted with all the sciences, but with the most eminent professors of them throughout Europe. He knew perfectly well the interests of its Princes, with the customs and fashions of their Courts, and could scarce meet with the name of an extraordinary person in the Gazette whom he had not either talked to or seen. In short, he had so well mixed and digested his knowledge of men and books, that he made one of the most accomplished persons of his age. During the whole course of his studies and travels he kept up a punctual correspondence with _Eudoxus_, who often made himself acceptable to the principal men about Court by the intelligence which he received from _Leontine_. When they were both turned of forty (an age in which, according to Mr. Cowley, there is no dallying with life) they determined, pursuant to the resolution they had taken in the beginning of their lives, to retire, and pass the remainder of their days in the country. In order to this, they both of them married much about the same time. _Leontine_, with his own and his wife’s fortune, bought a farm of three hundred a year, which lay within the neighbourhood of his friend _Eudoxus_, who had purchased an estate of as many thousands. They were both of them _fathers_ about the same time, _Eudoxus_ having a son born to him, and _Leontine_ a daughter; but to the unspeakable grief of the latter, his young wife (in whom all his happiness was wrapped up) died in a few days after the birth of her daughter. His affliction would have been insupportable, had he not been comforted by the daily visits and conversations of his friend. As they were one day talking together with their usual intimacy, _Leontine_, considering how incapable he was of giving his daughter a proper education in his own house, and _Eudoxus_ reflecting on the ordinary behaviour of a son who knows himself to be the heir of a great estate, they both agreed upon an exchange of children, namely that the boy should be bred up with _Leontine_ as his son, and that the
the girl should live with Eudoxus as his daughter, till they were each of them arrived at years of discretion. The wife of Eudoxus, knowing that her son could not be so advantageously brought up as under the care of Leontine, and considering at the same time that he would be perpetually under her own eye, was by degrees prevailed upon to fall in with the project. She therefore took Leonilla, for that was the name of the girl, and educated her as her own daughter. The two friends on each side had wrought themselves to such an habitual tenderness for the children who were under their direction, that each of them had the real passion of a father, where the title was but imaginary. Florio, the name of the young Heir that lived with Leontine, though he had all the duty and affection imaginable for his supposed parent, was taught to rejoice at the sight of Eudoxus, who visited his friend very frequently, and was dictated by his natural affection, as well as by the rules of prudence, to make himself esteemed and beloved by Florio. The boy was now old enough to know his supposed father's circumstances, and that therefore he was to make his way in the world by his own industry. This consideration grew stronger in him every day, and produced so good an effect, that he applied himself with more than ordinary attention to the pursuit of every thing which Leontine recommended to him. His natural abilities, which were very good, assisted by the directions of so excellent a counsellor, enabled him to make a quicker progress than ordinary through all the parts of his education. Before he was twenty years of age, having finished his studies and exercises with great applause, he was removed from the University to the Inns of Court, where there are very few that make themselves considerable proficient in the studies of the place, who know they shall arrive at great estates without them. This was not Florio's case; he found that three hundred a year was but a poor estate for Leontine and himself to live upon, so that he studied without intermission till he gained a very good insight into the constitution and laws of his country.

I should have told my Reader, that whilst Florio lived at the house of his foster-father, he was always an acceptable guest in the family of Eudoxus, where he became acquainted with Leonilla from her infancy. His acquaintance with her by degrees grew into love, which in a mind trained up in all the sentiments of honour and virtue became a very uneasy passion. He despair'd of gaining a Heir of so great a fortune, and would rather have died than attempted it by any indirect methods. Leonilla, who was a woman of the greatest beauty joined with the greatest modesty, entertained at the same time a secret passion for Florio, but condueted her self with so much prudence that she never gave him the least intimation of it. Florio was now engaged in all those arts and improvements that are proper to raise a man's private fortune, and give him a
burns with the greatest fury in a virtuous and noble heart, when he received a sudden summons from Leontine to repair to him into the country the next day. For it seems Eudoxus was so filled with the report of his son's reputation, that he could no longer with-hold making himself known to him. The morning after his arrival at the house of his sup-pposed father, Leontine told him that Eudoxus had something of great importance to communicate to him; upon which the good man embraced him, and wept. Florio was no sooner arrived at the great house that stood in his neighbourhood, but Eudoxus took him by the hand; after the first salutes were over, and conducted him into his closet. He there opened to him the whole secret of his parentage and education, concluding after this manner. I have no other way left of acknowledging my gratitude to Leontine, than by marrying you to your daughter. He shall not lose the pleasure of being your father, by the discovery I have made to you. Leonilla too shall be still my daughter; her filial piety, though misplaced, has been so exemplary that it deserves the greatest reward I can confer upon it. You shall have the pleasure of seeing a great estate fall to you, which you would have lost the relish of, had you known your self born to it. Continue only to deserve it in the same manner you did before you were possessed of it. I have left your mother in the next room. Her heart yearns towards you. She is making the same discoveries to Leonilla which I have made to your self. Florio was so overwhelmed with this profusion of happiness, that he was not able to make a reply, but threw himself down at his father's feet, and amidst a flood of tears, killed and embraced his knees, asking his blessing, and expresing in dumb show those sentiments of love, duty and gratitude that were too big for utterance. To conclude, the happy pair were married, and half Eudoxus's estate settled upon them. Leontine and Eudoxus paused the remainder of their lives together; and received in the dutiful and affectionate behaviour of Florio and Leonilla the just recompence, as well as the natural effects, of that care which they had bestowed upon them in their education.
A MAN who publishes his works in a Volume, has an infinite advantage over one who communicates his writings to the world in loose Tracts and single Pieces. We do not expect to meet with anything in a bulky volume, till after some heavy preamble, and several words of course, to prepare the Reader for what follows: nay, Authors have established it as a kind of rule, that a man ought to be dull sometimes; as the most severe Reader makes allowances for many refs and nodding-places in a voluminous writer. This gave occasion to the famous Greek proverb which I have chosen for my motto, That a great book is a great evil.

On the contrary, those who publish their thoughts in distinct sheers, and as it were by piece-meal, have none of these advantages. We must immediately fall into our subject, and treat every part of it in a lively manner, or our papers are thrown by as dull and insipid: our matter must lye close together, and either be wholly new in it self, or in the turn it receives from our expressions. Were the books of our best Authors thus to be retailed to the publick, and every page submitted to the taste of forty or fifty thousand Readers, I am afraid we should complain of many flat expressions, trivial observations, beaten topics, and common thoughts, which go off very well in the lump. At the same time, notwithstanding some papers may be made up of broken hints and irregular sketches, it is often expected that every sheet should be a kind of treatise, and make out in thought what it wants in bulk: that a point of humour should be worked up in all its parts; and a subject touched upon in its most essential articles, without the repetitions, tautologies, and enlargements that are indulged to longer labours. The ordinary writers of morality prescribe to their Readers after the Galenick way; their medicines are made up in large quantities. An Essay writer must practise in the chymical method, and give the virtue of a full draught in a few drops. Were all books books reduced thus to their quintessence, many a bulky Author would make his appearance in a penny paper: there would be scarce such a thing in nature as a folio: the works of an age would be contained on a few shelves; not to mention millions of volumes that would be utterly annihilated.

I cannot think that the difficulty of furnishing out separate papers of this nature, has hindered Authors from communicating their thoughts to the world after such a manner: though I must confess I am amazed that the press should be only made use of in this way by news-writers, and the zealots of parties: as if it were not more advantageous to mankind, to be instructed in wisdom and virtue, than in politics; and to be made good fathers, husbands, and sons, than counsellors and statesmen. Had the Philosophers and great men of antiquity, who took so much pains in order to instruct mankind, and leave the world wiser and better than they found it; had they, I say, been possessed of the art of printing, there is no question but they would have made such an advantage of it, in dealing out their lectures to the publick. Our common prints would be of great use, were they thus calculated to diffuse good sense through the bulk of a people, to clear up their understandings, animte their minds with virtue, difflate the sorrows of a heavy heart, or unbend the mind from its more seveve employments with innocent amusements. When knowledge, instead of being bound up in books, and kept in libraries and retirements, is thus obtruded upon the publick; when it is canvassed in every assembly, and exposed upon every table; I cannot forbear reflecting upon that passage in the Proverbs, "Wisdom crieth without: She uttereth her voice in the streets: she crieth in the chief place of concourse, in the openings of the gates. In the city she uttereth her words, saying, How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? and the scorners delight in their scorning? and fools hate knowledge?"

The many letters which come to me from persons of the best sense in both sexes, (for I may pronounce their characters from their way of writing) do not a little encourage me in the prosecution of this my undertaking: besides that, my bookseller tells me, the demand for these my papers increases daily. It is at his instance that I shall continue my rural Speculations to the end of this month; several having made up separate fets of them, as they have done before of those relating to Wit, to Operas, to points of Morality, or subjects of Humour.

I am not at all mortified, when sometimes I see my works thrown aside by men of no taste nor learning. There is a kind of heaviness and igno-ignorance that hangs upon the minds of ordinary men, which is too thick for knowledge to break through: their souls are not to be enlightened,

—Nōx atra caeca circumvolat umbra.

To these I must apply the fable of the Mole, That after having consulted many Oculists for the bettering of his sight, was at last provided with a good pair of spectacles; but upon his endeavouring to make use of them, his mother told him very prudently, “That spectacles, though as they might help the eye of a man, could be of no use to a Mole.” It is not therefore for the benefit of Moles that I publish these my daily Effays.

But besides such as are Moles through ignorance, there are others who are Moles through envy. As it is laid in the Latin proverb, “That one ‘man is a wolf to another,’” so, generally speaking, one Author is a Mole to another Author. It is impossible for them to discover beauties in one another’s works; they have eyes only for spots and blemishes; they can indeed see the light, as it is said of the animals which are their namesakes, but the idea of it is painful to them; they immediately shut their eyes upon it, and withdraw themselves into a wilful obscurity. I have already caught two or three of these dark undermining vermin, and intend to make a string of them, in order to hang them up in one of my papers, as an example to all such voluntary Moles.

Nō 125. Tuesday, July 24.

Ne pueri, ne tanta animis afferrentes bella:
Ne patria validas in vissent virtute vires.

Virg.

My worthy friend Sir Roger, when we are talking of the malice of parties, very frequently tells us an accident that happened to him when he was a school-boy, which was at a time when the feuds ran high between the Round-heads and Cavaliers. This worthy Knight being then but a stripling, had occasion to enquire which was the
the way to St. Anne's lane, upon which the person whom he spoke to, instead of answering his question, called him a young popish cur, and asked him who had made Anne a Saint! The boy being in some confusion, enquired of the next he met, which was the way to Anne's lane; but was called a prick-eyed cur for his pains, and instead of being shown the way, was told, that she had been a Saint before he was born, and would be one after he was hanged. Upon this, says Sir Roger, I did not think fit to repeat the former question, but going into every lane of the neighbourhood, asked what they called the name of that lane. By which ingenious artifice he found out the place he enquired after, without giving offence to any party. Sir Roger generally closes this narrative with reflections on the mischief that Parties do in the country; how they spoil good neighbourhood, and make honest Gentlemen hate one another; besides that they manifestly tend to the prejudice of the land-tax, and the destruction of the game.

There cannot a greater judgment befall a country than such a dreadful spirit of division as rends a Government into two distinct people, and makes them greater strangers and more averse to one another, than if they were actually two different nations. The effects of such a division are pernicious to the last degree, not only with regard to those advantages which they give the common enemy, but to those private evils which they produce in the heart of almost every particular person. This influence is very fatal both to mens morals and their understandings; it sinks the virtue of a nation, and not only so, but destroys even common sense.

A furious Party-spirit, when it rages in its full violence, exerts it self in civil war and bloodshed; and when it is under its greatest restraints, naturally breaks out in falsehood, detraction, calumny, and a partial administration of justice. In a word, it fills a nation with spleen and ran-cour, and extinguishes all the seeds of good-nature, compassion and humanity.

Plutarch says very finely, that a man should not allow himself to hate even his enemies, because, says he, if you indulge this passion in some occasions, it will ride of it self in others; if you hate your enemies, you will contract such a vicious habit of mind, as by degrees will break out upon those who are your friends, or those who are indifferent to you. I might here observe how admirably this precept of morality (which deserves the malignity of hatred from the passion it self, and not from its object) answers to that great rule which was dictated to the world about an hundred years before this Philosopher wrote; but instead of that, I shall only take notice, with a real grief of heart, that the minds of many good men among us appear Fowlered with party-principles, and alienated from one another in such a manner, as seems to me altogether inconsistent with the dictates either of reason or religion. Zeal for a publick cause is apt to breed passions in the hearts of virtuous persons, to which the regard of their own private interest would never have betrayed them.

If this Party-spirit has so ill an effect on our morals, it has likewise a very great one upon our judgments. We often hear a poor insipid paper or pamphlet cryed up, and sometimes a noble piece depreciated, by those who are of a different principle from the Author. One who is actuated by this spirit, is almost under an incapacity of discerning either real blemishes or beauties. A man of merit in a different principle, is like an object seen in two different mediums, that appears crooked or broken, however straight and entire it may be in itself. For this reason there is scarce a person of any figure in England, who does not go by two contrary characters, as opposite to one another as light and darkness. Knowledge and learning suffer in a particular manner from this strange prejudice, which at present prevails amongst all ranks and degrees in the British nation. As men formerly became eminent in learned societies by their parts and acquisitions, they now distinguish themselves by the warmth and violence with which they espouse their respective parties. Books are valued upon the like considerations: an abusive scurrilous style passes for Satyr, and a dull scheme of Party-notions is called Fine writing.

There is one piece of Sophistry practised by both sides, and that is the taking any scandalous story that has been ever whispered or invented of a private man, for a known undisputed truth, and raising suitable speculations upon it. Calumnies that have been never proved, or have been often refuted, are the ordinary postulates of these infamous scribblers, upon which they proceed as upon first principles granted by all men, though in their hearts they know they are false, or at least very doubtful. When they have laid these foundations of featurility, it is no wonder that their superstructure is every way anwserable to them. If this shameless practice of the present age endures much longer, praise and reproach will cease to be motives of action in good men.

There are certain periods of time in all Governments when this inhuman spirit prevails. Italy was long torn in pieces by the Guelphs and Ghibelines, and France by those who were for and against the League; but but it is very unhappy for a man to be born in such a stormy and tempestuous season. It is the restless ambition of artful men that thus breaks a people into factions, and draws several well-meaning persons to their interest by a specious concern for their country. How many honest minds are filled with uncharitable and barbarous notions, out of their zeal for the publick good? What cruelties and outrages would they not commit against men of an adverse party, whom they would honour and esteem, if instead of considering them as they are represented, they knew them as they are? Thus are persons of the greatest probity seduced into shameful errors and prejudices, and made bad men even by that noblest of principles, the love of their country. I cannot here forbear mentioning the famous Spanish proverb, If there were neither fools nor knaves in the world, all people would be of one mind.

For my own part, I could heartily wish that all honest men would enter into an association, for the support of one another against the endeavours of those whom they ought to look upon as their common enemies, whatsoever side they may belong to. Were there such an honest body of neutral forces, we should never see the worst of men in great figures of life, because they are useful to a party; nor the best unregarded, because they are above practising those methods which would be grateful to their faction. We should then single every criminal out of the herd, and hunt him down, however formidable and overgrown he might appear: On the contrary, we should shelter diffused innocence, and defend virtue, however beset with contempt or ridicule, envy or defamation. In short, we should not any longer regard our fellow-subjects as Whigs and Tories, but should make the man of merit our friend, and the villain our enemy.
In my yesterday's paper I proposed, that the honest men of all parties should enter into a kind of affection for the defence of one another and the confusion of their common enemies. As it is designed this neutral body should act with a regard to nothing but truth and equity, and divest themselves of the little heats and prepossession that cleave to parties of all kinds, I have prepared for them the following form of an affection, which may express their intentions in the most plain and simple manner.

"We whose names are hereunto subscribed, do solemnly declare, that we do in our Consciences believe two and two make four; and that we shall adjudge any man whatsoever to be our enemy who endeavours to persuade us to the contrary. We are likewise ready to maintain, with the hazard of all that is near and dear to us, that six is less than seven in all times and all places; and that ten will not be more three years hence than it is at present. We do also firmly declare, that it is our resolution as long as we live to call black black, and white white. And we shall upon all occasions oppose such persons that upon any day of the year shall call black white, or white black, with the utmost peril of our lives and fortunes.

Were there such a combination of honest men, who without any regard to places, would endeavour to extirpate all such furious zealots as would sacrifice one half of their country to the passion and interest of the other; as also such infamous hypocrites, that are for promoting their own advantage, under colour of the publik good; with all the profigate immoral retainers to each side, that have nothing to recommend them but an implicit submission to their leaders; we should soon see that furious Party-spirit extinguished, which may in time expose us to the derision and contempt of all the nations about us."
A member of this society, that would thus carefully employ himself in making room for merit, by throwing down the worthlesls and depraved part of mankind from those conspicuous stations of life to which they have been sometimes advanced, and all this without any regard to his private interest, would be no small benefactor to his country.

I remember to have read in Diodorus Siculus an account of a very active little animal, which I think he calls the Ichneumon, that makes it the whole bufines of his life to break the eggs of the crocodile, which he is always in search after. This instinct is the more remarkable, because the Ichneumon never feeds upon the eggs he has broken, nor any other way finds his account in them. Were it not for the incessant labours of this indolent animal, Egypt, says the Historian, would be over-run with crocodiles; for the Egyptians are so far from destroying those pernicious creatures, that they worship them as Gods.

If we look into the behaviour of ordinary partizans, we shall find them far from resembling this disinterested animal; and rather acting after the example of the wild Tartars, who are ambitious of destroying a man of the most extraordinary parts and accomplishments, as thinking that upon his decease the same talents, what-ever post they qualified him for, enter of course into his destroyer.

As in the whole train of my Speculations, I have endeavoured as much as I am able to extinguish that pernicious spirit of passion and prejudice, which rages with the same violence in all parties, I am still the more desirous of doing some good in this particular, because I observe that the spirit of party reigns more in the country than in the town. It here contracts a kind of brutality and rustic fierceness, to which men of a politer conversation are wholly strangers. It extends it self even to the return of the bow and the hat; and at the same time that the heads of parties preserve towards one another an outward show of good breeding, and keep up a perpetual intercourse of civilities, their tools that are duffered in these outlying parts will not so much as mingle together at a cock-match. This humour fills the country with several periodical meetings of whig jockeys and tory fox-hunters; not to mention the innumerable curfews, frowns, and whisperer, it produces at a Quarter-fellow.

I do not know whether I have observed in any of my former papers, that my friends Sir Roger de Coverly and Sir Andrew Freeport are of different principles, the first of them inclined to the landed and the other to the moneyed interest. This humour is so moderate in each of them, that it proceeds no farther than to an agreeable raillery, which which very often diverts the rest of the club. I find however that the Knight is a much stronger Tory in the country than in town, which, as he has told me in my ear, is absolutely necessary for the keeping up his interest. In all our journey from London to his house we did not so much as bait at a Whig-inn; or if by chance the coachman stopped at a wrong place, one of Sir Roger’s servants would ride up to his master full speed, and whisper to him that the master of the house was against such an one in the last election. This often betrayed us into hard beds and bad cheer; for we were not so inquisitive about the Inn as the Inn-keeper; and provided our landlord’s principles were found, did not take any notice of the flattery of his provisions. This I found still the more inconvenient, because the better the Host was, the worse generally were his accommodations; the fellow knowing very well, that those who were his friends, would take up with coarse diet and an hard lodging. For these reasons, all the while I was upon the road, I dreaded entering into an house of any one that Sir Roger had applauded for an honest man.

Since my stay at Sir Roger’s in the country, I daily find more instances of this narrow party-humour. Being upon the bowling-green at a neighbouring market-town the other day, (for that is the place where the Gentlemen of one side meet once a week) I observed a stranger among them of a better presence and gentler behaviour than ordinary; but was much surprized, that notwithstanding he was a very fair better, no body would take him up. But upon enquiry I found, that he was one who had given a disagreeable vote in a former Parliament, for which reason there was not a man upon that bowling-green who would have so much correspondence with him as to win his money of him.

Among other instances of this nature, I must not omit one which concerns myself. Will Wimbly was the other day relating several strange stories that he had picked up no body knows where of a certain great man; and upon my staring at him, as one that was surprized to hear such things in the country, which had never been so much as whispered in the town, Will stopped short in the thread of his discourse, and after dinner asked my friend Sir Roger in his ear if he was sure that I was not a fanatick.

It gives me a serious concern to see such a spirit of diffeision in the country; not only as it destroys virtue and common sense, and renders us in a manner Barbarians towards one another, but as it perpetuates our animosities, widens our breaches, and transmits our present passions and prejudices to our posterity. For my own part, I am sometimes afraid that that I discover the seeds of a Civil War in these our divisions: and therefore cannot but bewail, as in their first principles, the miseries and calamities of our children.

--- Quantum est in rebus mane? ---

--- Perf. ---

IT is our custom at Sir Roger's, upon the coming in of the Post, to sit about a pot of coffee, and hear the old Knight read Dyer's letter, which he does with his spectacles upon his nose, and in an audible voice; smiling very often at those little strokes of Satyr, which are so frequent in the writings of that Author. I afterwards communicate to the Knight such packets as I receive under the quality of Spectator. The following letter chancing to please him more than ordinary, I shall publish it at his request.

Mr. Spectator,

"YOU have diverted the town almost a whole month at the expense of the country; it is now high time that you should give the country their revenge. Since your withdrawing from this place, the fair sex are run into great extravagancies. Their petticoats, which began to heave and swell before you left us, are now blown up into a most enormous concave, and rise every day more and more: in short, Sir, since our women know themselves to be out of the eye of the Spectator, they will be kept within no compas. You praised them a little too soon, for the modesty of their head-dresses; for as the humour of a sick person is often driven out of one limb into another, their superfluity of ornaments, instead of being entirely banished, seems only fallen from their heads upon their lower parts. What they have lost in height they make up in breadth; and contrary to all rules of architecture widen the foundations at the same time that they shorten the superstructure. Were they, like Spanish jennets, to im. preggnate by the wind, they could not have thought on a more proper invention."
"invention. But as we do not yet hear any particular ufe in this petticoat, or that it contains any thing more than what was suppoed to be in those of scantier make, we are wonderfully at a loss about it.
"The women give out, in defence of these wide bottoms, that they are airy, and very proper for the season; but this I look upon to be only a pretence, and a piece of art, for it is well known we have not had a more moderate summer these many years, so that it is certain the heat they complain of cannot be in the weather: besides, I would fain ask these tender-constitutioned Ladies, why they should require more cooling than their mothers before them.
"I find several speculative persons are of opinion that our sex has of late years been very fayce, and that the hoop-petticoat is made ufe of to keep us at a distance. It is most certain that a woman's honour cannot be better entrenched than after this manner, in circle within circle, amidst such a variety of out-works and lines of circumvallation.
A female who is thus invested in whale-bone, is sufficiently secured agamst the approaches of an ill-bred fellow, who might as well think of Sir George Etheridge's way of making love in a tub, as in the midst of so many hoops.
"Among these various conjectures, there are men of superfluous temper, who look upon the hoop-petticoat as a kind of prodigy. Some will have it that it portends the downfall of the French King, and observe that the farthingale appeared in England a little before the ruine of the Spanish monarchy. Others are of opinion that it foretells battle and blood-let, and believe it of the same prognostication as the tail of a blazing star. For my part, I am apt to think it is a sign that multitudes are coming into the world, rather than going out of it.
"The first time I saw a Lady dressed in one of these petticoats, I could not forbear blaming her in my own thoughts for walking abroad when she was so near her time; but soon recovered my felf out of my error, when I found all the modish part of the sex as far gone as her self. It is generally thought some crafty women have thus betrayed their companions into hoops, that they might make them accesary to their own concealments, and by that means escape the notice of the world; as wary generals have sometimes dressed two or three dozen of their friends in their own habit, that they might not draw upon themselves any particular attacks from the enemy. The fluttering p Petticoat smooths all distinctions, levels the mother with the daughter, and sets maids and matrons, wives and widows, upon the same bottom.

"In the mean while, I cannot but be troubled to see so many well-shaped innocent virgins bloated up, and waddling up and down like big-bellied women.

"Should this fashion get among the ordinary people, our publick ways would be so crowded that we should want street-room. Several congregations of the best fashion find themselves already very much frightened, and if the mode encrease, I wish it may not drive many ordinary women into meetings and conventicles. Should our sex at the same time take it into their heads to wear trunk breeches (as who knows what their indignation at this female treatment may drive them to) a man and his wife would fill a whole pew.

"You know, Sir, it is recorded of Alexander the Great, that in his Indian expedition he buried several suits of armour which by his directions were made much too big for any of his soldiers, in order to give posterity an extraordinary Idea of him, and make them believe he had commanded an army of Giants. I am persuaded that if one of the present petticoats happens to be hung up in any repository of curiosties, it will lead into the same error the generations that lie some time from us; unless we can believe our posterity will think so disrespectfully of their great grand-mothers, that they made themselves monstrous to appear amiable.

"When I survey this new-fashioned Rotunda in all its parts, I cannot but think of the old Philosopher, who after having entered into an Egyptian Temple, and looked about for the Idol of the place, at length discovered a little black Monkey enshrined in the midst of it; upon which he could not forbear crying out, (to the great scandal of the worshippers,) What a magnificent Palace is here for such a ridiculous inhabitant!

"Though you have taken a resolution, in one of your papers, to avoid descending to particularities of drefs, I believe you will not think it below you on so extraordinary an occasion, to unhoop the fair sex, and cut this fashionable tympamy that is got among them. I am apt to think the petticoat will shrink of its own accord at your first co-ing to town; at least a touch of your pen will make it contract it self, like the sensitive plant, and by that means oblige several who are either terrified or afflicted at this portentous novelty, and among the rest,

Your humble Servant, &c.

Friday,
WOMEN in their nature are much more gay and joyous than men; whether it be that their blood is more refined, their fibres more delicate, and their animal spirits more light and volatile; or whether, as some have imagined, there may not be a kind of sex in the very Soul, I shall not pretend to determine. As vivacity is the gift of women, gravity is that of men. They should each of them therefore keep a watch upon the particular bias which nature has fixed in their minds, that it may not draw too much, and lead them out of the paths of reason. This will certainly happen, if the one in every word and action affects the character of being rigid and severe, and the other of being brisk and airy. Men should beware of being captivated by a kind of savage Philosophy, women by a thoughtless gallantry. Where these precautions are not observed, the man often degenerates into a Cynick, the woman into a Coquette; the man grows sullen and morose, the woman impatient and fantastical.

By what I have said we may conclude, men and women were made as counterparts to one another, that the pains and anxieties of the husband might be relieved by the sprightliness and good humour of the wife. When these are rightly tempered, care and cheerfulness go hand in hand; and the family, like a ship that is duly trimmed, wants neither fail nor ballast.

Natural Historians observe, (for whilst I am in the country I must fetch my allusions from thence) that only the male birds have voices; that their songs begin a little before breeding-time, and end a little after; that whilst the hen is covering her eggs, the male generally takes his stand upon a neighbouring bough within her hearing; and by that means amuses and diverts her with his songs during the whole time of her sitting.

This contract among birds lasts no longer than till a brood of young ones arises from it; so that in the feathered kind, the cares and fatigues of
of the married state, if I may so call it, lie principally upon the female. On the contrary, as in our species the man and the woman are joined together for life, and the main burden rests upon the former, Nature has given all the little arts of soothing and blandishment to the female, that she may cheer and animate her companion in a constant and assiduous application to the making a provision for his family, and the educating of their common children. This however is not to be taken so strictly, as if the same duties were not often reciprocal, and incumbent on both parties; but only to set forth what seems to have been the general intention of nature, in the different inclinations and endowments which are bestowed on the different sexes.

But whatever was the reason that man and woman were made with this variety of temper, if we observe the conduct of the fair sex, we find that they chuse rather to associate themselves with a person who resembles them in that light and volatile humour which is natural to them, than to such as are qualified to moderate and counter-balance it. It has been an old complaint, that the coxcomb carries it with them before the man of sense. When we see a fellow loud and talkative, full of insipid life and laughter, we may venture to pronounce him a female favourite: Noise and flutter are such accomplishments as they cannot withstand. To be short, the passion of an ordinary woman for a man, is nothing else but self-love diverted upon another object: she would have the Lover a woman in every thing but the sex. I do not know a finer piece of satire on this part of womankind, than these lines of Mr. Dryden.

Our thoughtless sex is caught by outward form
And empty vice, and loves it self in man.

This is a source of infinite calamities to the sex, as it frequently joins them to men who in their own thoughts are as fine creatures as themselves; or if they chance to be good-humoured, serve only to dissipate their fortunes, inflame their follies, and aggravate their indiscretions.

The same female levity is no less fatal to them after marriage than before: It represents to their imaginations the faithful prudent husband as an honest, tractable, and domestic animal; and turns their thoughts upon the fine gay Gentleman that laughs, sings, and circles so much more agreeably.

As this irregular vivacity of temper leads aldray the hearts of ordinary women in the choice of their lovers and the treatment of their husbands, it operates with the same pernicious influence towards their children.

Vol. III.

who are taught to accomplish themselves in all those sublime perfections that appear captivating in the eye of their mother. She admires in her Son what she loved in her Gallant; and by that means contributes all she can to perpetuate her self in a weightless progeny.

The younger Faustina was a lively instance of this sort of women. Notwithstanding she was married to Marcus Aurelius, one of the greatest, wisest, and best of the Roman Emperors, the thought a common Gladiatrix much the prettier Gentleman; and had taken such care to accomplish her son Commodus according to her own notions of a fine man, that when he ascended the Throne of his father, he became the most foolish and abandoned tyrant that was ever placed at the head of the Roman Empire, signalizing himself in nothing but the fighting of prizes, and knocking out mens brains. As he had no taste of true Glory, we see him in several Medals and Statues which are still extant of him, equipped like an Hercules with a Club and a Lion's skin.

I have been led into this Speculation by the characters I have heard of a Country-gentleman and his Lady, who do not live many miles from Sir Roger. The wife is an old Coquette, that is always hankering after the diversions of the town; the husband a morose rustick, that frowns and frets at the name of it. The wife is over-run with affectation, the husband funk into brutality: the Lady cannot bear the noise of the Larks and Nightingales, hates your tedious summer-days, and is sick at the sight of shady woods and purling streams; the husband wonders how any one can be pleased with the fooleries of Plays and Operas, and rails from morning to night at essenced Fops and tawdry Courtiers. The children are educated in these different notions of their parents. The sons follow the father about his grounds, while the daughters read volumes of love-letters and romances to their mother. By this means it comes to pass that the girls look upon their father as a clown, and the boys think their mother no better than she should be.

How different are the lives of Aristus and Alpatia? The innocent vivacity of the one is tempered and compos'd by the cheerful gravity of the other. The wife grows wise by the discourse of the husband, and the husband good-humoured by the conversation of the wife. Aristus would not be so amiable were it not for his Alpatia, nor Alpatia so much to be esteemed were it not for her Aristus. Their virtues are blended in their children, and diffuse through the whole family a perpetual spirit of benevolence, complacency, and satisfaction.

Saturday,
GREAT matters in Painting never care for drawing people in the fashion; as very well knowing that the head-dres, or periwig, that now prevails, and gives a grace to their portraiture at prefent, will make a very odd figure, and perhaps look monstros in the eyes of posterity. For this reason they often represent an illustrious person in a Roman habit, or in some other dres that never varies. I could will, for the sake of my country friends, that there was such a kind of everlasting drapery to be made use of by all who live at a certain dis-ance from the town, and that they would agree upon such fashions as should never be liable to changes and innovations. For want of this standing dres, a man who takes a journey into the country is as much surprized, as one who walks in a gallery of old family pictures; and finds as great a variety of garbs and habits in the persons he con-verses with. Did they keep to one constant dres, they would sometimes be in the fashion, which they never are as matters are managed at prefent. If instead of running after the mode, they would continue fixed in one certain habit, the mode would sometime or other overtake them, as a clock that stands still is sure to point right once in twelve hours;
in this case therefore I would advise them, as a Gentleman did his friend who was hunting about the whole town after a rambling fellow; If you follow him you will never find him, but if you plant your self at the corner of any one street, I’ll engage it will not be long before you see him.

I have already touched upon this subject, in a Speculation which shews how cruelly the country are led astray in following the town; and equipped in a ridiculous habit, when they fancy themselves in the height of the mode. Since that Speculation I have received a letter (which I there hinted at) from a Gentleman who is now in the Western Circuit.
Mr. Spectator,

"BEING a Lawyer of the Middle Temple, a Cornishman by birth, I generally ride the Western Circuit for my health, and as I am not interrupted with Clients, have leisure to make many observations that escape the notice of my fellow-travellers.

"One of the most fashionable women I met with in all the Circuit was my Landlady at Staines, where I chanced to be on a holiday. Her commode was not half a foot high, and her petticoat within some yards of a modish circumference. In the same place I observed a young fellow with a tolerable periwig, had it not been covered with a hat that was shaped in the Ramillies cock. As I proceeded in my journey I observed the petticoat grew scantier and scantier, and about three score miles from London was so very unfashionable, that a woman might walk in it without any manner of inconvenience.

"Not far from Salisbury I took notice of a Justice of Peace's Lady, who was at least ten years behind hand in her dress, but at the same time as fine as hands could make her. She was flounced and tumbled from head to foot; every ribbon was wrinkled, and every part of her garments in curl, so that she looked like one of those animals which in the country we call a Friestland hen.

"Not many miles beyond this place I was informed that one of the last year's little Muffs had by some means or other straggled into those parts, and that all the women of fashion were cutting their old Muffs in two, or retrenching them, according to the little model which was got among them. I cannot believe the report they have there, that it was sent down franked by a Parliament-man in a little packet; but probably by next winter this fashion will be at the height in the country, when it is quite out at London.

"The greatest beat at our next country Sessions was dressed in a most monstrous flaxen periwig, that was made in King William's Reign. The wearer of it goes, it seems, in his own hair, when he is at home, and lets his wig lye in buckle for a whole half year, that he may put it on upon occasion to meet the Judges in it.

"I must not here omit an adventure which happened to us in a country church upon the frontiers of Cornwall. As we were in the midst of the service, a Lady who is the chief woman of the place, and had passed the winter at London with her husband, entered the congregation in a little head-dress, and a hooped-petticoat. The people, who were were wonderfully startled at such a sight, all of them rose up. Some flared at the prodigious bottom, and some at the little top of this strange dress. In the mean time the Lady of the Manor filled the Acre of the church, and walked up to her pew with an unpeachable satisfaction, amidst the whispers, conjectures and astonishments of the whole congregation.

Upon our way from hence we saw a young fellow riding towards us full gallop, with a bob-wig and a black silken bag tied to it. He flopped short at the coach, to ask us how far the Judges were behind us.
His stay was so very short, that we had only time to observe his new silk waistcoat, which was unbuttoned in several places to let us see that he had a clean shirt on, which was ruffled down to his middle.

From this place, during our progress through the most western parts of the kingdom, we fancied ourselves in King Charles the Second's Reign, the people having made very little variations in their dress since that time. The smarter of the country Squires appear still in the Monmouth cock, and when they go a wooing (whether they have any post in the Militia or not) they generally put on a red coat. We were indeed very much surprized, at the place we lay at last night, to meet with a Gentleman that had accoutered himself in a night-cap wig, a coat with long pockets and slit sleeves, and a pair of shoes with high scollop tops; but we soon found by his conversation that he was a person who laughed at the ignorance and rusticity of the country people, and was resolved to live and die in the mode.

Sir, If you think this account of my travels may be of any advantage to the publick, I will next year trouble you with such occurrences as I shall meet with in other parts of England. For I am informed there are greater curiosities in the Northern Circuit than in the Western; and that a fashion makes its progress much slower into Cumberland than into Cornwall. I have heard in particular, that the Steenkirk arrived but two months ago at Newcastle, and that there are several commodes in those parts which are worth taking a journey thither to see.

Monday,
As I was yesterday riding out in the fields with my friend Sir Roger, we saw at a little distance from us a troop of Gypsies. Upon the first discovery of them, my friend was in some doubt whether he should not exert the justice of peace upon such a band of lawless vagrants; but not having his clerk with him, who is a necessary counsellor on such occasions, and fearing that his poultry might fare the worse for it, he let the thought drop. But at the same time gave me a particular account of the mischief they do in the country, in stealing people's goods and spoiling their servants. If a stray piece of linen hangs upon an hedge, says Sir Roger, they are sure to have it; if a hog loses his way in the fields, it is ten to one but he becomes their prey; our geese cannot live in peace for them; if a man prosecutes them with severity, his hens-roost it sure to pay for it: they generally straggle into these parts about this time of the year; and set the heads of our servantsmaids to agog for husbands, that we do not expect to have any business done, as it should be, whilst they are in the country. I have an honest dairy-maid who crosses their hands with a piece of silver every summer; and never fails being promised the handsomest young fellow in the parish for her pains. Your friend the butler has been fool enough to be seduced by them; and though he is sure to lose a knife, a fork, or a spoon every time his fortune is told him, generally shuts himself up in the pantry with an old Gypsy for above half an hour once in a twelve-month. Sweet-hearts are the things they live upon, which they beseech very plentifully upon all those that apply themselves to them. You see now and then some handsome young Jades among them: the Sluts have very often white teeth and black eyes.

Sir
Sir Roger observing that I listened with great attention to his account of a people who were so entirely new to me, told me, That if I would, they should tell us our fortunes. As I was very well pleased with the Knight's proposal, we rid up and communicated our hands to them. A Cassandra of the crew, after having examined my lines very diligently, told me, That I loved a pretty maid in a corner, that I was a good woman's man, with some other particulars which I do not think proper to relate. My friend Sir Roger alighted from his horse, and exposing his palm to two or three that stood by him, they crumbled it into all shapes, and diligently scanned every wrinkle that could be made in it; when one of them who was older and more sun-burnt than the rest, told him, That he had a widow in his line of life: upon which the Knight cried, 'Go, go, you are an idle baggage; and at the same time smiled upon me. The Gypsy finding he was not displeased in his heart, told him after a further enquiry into his hand, that his true-love was constant, and that she should dream of him to-night. My old friend cried 'Piff, and bid him go on.' The Gypsy told him that he was a Bachelor, but would not be long; and that he was dearer to some body than he thought: The Knight still repeated, he was an idle baggage, and bid her go on. 'Ah! Master, says the Gypsy, that rogues learn of yours; makes a pretty woman's heart ake; you ha'n't that simper about the mouth for nothing—- The uncouth glibberish with which all this was uttered like the darkness of an Oracle, made us the more attentive to it. To be short, the Knight left the money with her that he had crost her hand with, and got up again on his horse. As we were riding away, Sir Roger told me, that he knew several sensible people who believed these Gypsies now and then foretold very strange things; and for half an hour together appeared more jocund than orderly. In the height of this good humour, meeting a common beggar upon the road who was no conjurer, as he went to relieve him he found his pocket was picked; that being a kind of Palmistry at which this race of vermin are very dexterous.

I might here entertain my Reader with historical Remarks on this idle profligate people, who infest all the countries of Europe, and live in the midst of Governments in a kind of Common-wealth by themselves. But instead of entering into observations of this nature, I shall fill the remaining part of my paper with a story which is still fresh in Holland, and was printed in one of our monthly accounts about twenty years ago. "As the Treksebouy, or Hackney-boat, which carries passengers from Leiden..."
Leiden to Amsterdam, was putting off, a boy running along the side of the canal, desired to be taken in; which the master of the boat refused, because the lad had not quite money enough to pay the usual fare. An eminent Merchant being pleased with the looks of the boy, and secretly touched with compassion towards him, paid the money for him, and ordered him to be taken on board. Upon talking with him afterwards, he found that he could speak readily in three or four languages, and learned upon further examination that he had been stolen away when he was a child by a Gypsy, and had rambled ever since with a gang of those strumpets up and down several parts of Europe.

It happened that the Merchant, whose heart seems to have inclined towards the boy by a secret kind of instinct, had himself lost a child some years before. The parents, after a long search for him, gave him for drowned in one of the canals with which that country abounds; and the mother was so afflicted at the loss of a fine boy, who was her only son, that she died for grief of it. Upon laying together all particulars, and examining the several moles and marks by which the mother used to describe the child when he was first missing, the boy proved to be the son of the Merchant, whose heart had so unaccountably melted at the sight of him. The lad was very well pleased to find a father who was so rich, and likely to leave him a good estate; the father, on the other hand, was not a little delighted to see a son return to him, whom he had given for lost, with such a strength of Constitution, sharpness of Understanding, and skill in Languages." Here the printed story leaves off; but if I may give credit to reports, our linguist having received such extraordinary rudiments towards a good education, was afterwards trained up in every thing that becomes a Gentleman; wearing off by little and little all the vicious habits and practices that he had been used to in the course of his peregrinations: Nay, it is said, that he has since been employed in foreign Courts upon national business, with great reputation to himself, and honour to those who sent him, and that he has visited several countries as a publick Minister, in which he formerly wandered as a Gypsy.

---Ipse nursum concudit sylve.--- Virg.

It is usual for a man who loves country sports to preserve the game in his own grounds, and divert himself upon those that belong to his neighbour. My friend Sir Roger generally goes two or three miles from his house, and gets into the frontiers of his estate, before he beats about in search of a Hare or Partridge, on purpose to spare his own fields, where he is always sure of finding diversion when the sport comes to the worst. By this means the breed about his house has time to encrease and multiply, besides that the sport is the more agreeable where the game is harder to come at, and where it does not lie so thick as to produce any perplexity or confusion in the pursuit. For these reasons the country Gentleman, like the Fox, seldom preys near his own home.

In the same manner I have made a month's excursion out of the town, which is the great field of game for sportsmen of my species, to try my fortune in the country, where I have flirted several subjects, and hunted them down, with some pleasure to myself, and I hope to others. I am here forced to use a great deal of diligence before I can spring anything to my mind, whereas in town, whilst I am following one character, it is often to one but I am crooked in my way by another, and put up such a variety of odd creatures in both feses, that they foil the scent of one another, and puzzle the chase. My greatest difficulty in the country is to find sport, and in town to chuse it. In the mean time, as I have given a whole month's rest to the Cities of London and Westminster, I promise my self abundance of new game upon my return thither.

It is indeed high time for me to leave the country, since I find the whole neighbourhood begin to grow very inquisitive after my name and character: My love of solitude, taciturnity, and particular way of life, having raised a great curiosity in all these parts.

The notions which have been framed of me are various: Some look upon me as very proud, some as very modest, and some as very melancholy.
choly. Will Wimble, as my friend the Butler tells me, observing me very much alone, and extremely silent when I am in company, is afraid I have killed a man. The country people seem to suspect me for a Conjurer; and some of them hearing of the visit which I made to Moll White, will needs have it that Sir Roger has brought down a Cunning-man with him, to cure the old woman, and free the country from her charms. So that the character which I go under in part of the neighbourhood, is what they here call a white Witch.

A Justice of Peace, who lives about five miles off, and is not of Sir Roger’s party, has it seems said twice or thrice at his table, that he wishes Sir Roger does not harbour a Jesuit in his house, and that he thinks the Gentlemen of the country would do very well to make me give some account of myself.

On the other side, some of Sir Roger’s friends are afraid the old Knight is imposed upon by a designing fellow, and as they have heard he converses very promiscuously when he is in town, do not know but he has brought down with him some discarded Whig, that is fallen, and says nothing, because he is out of place.

Such is the variety of opinions which are here entertained of me, so that I pass among some for a disaffected person, and among others for a Papist Priest; among some for a wizard, and among others for a murderer; and all this for no other reason, that I can imagine, but because I do not howl and hollow and make a noise. If it is true, my friend Sir Roger tells them that it is my way, and that I am only a Philosopher; but this will not satisfy them. They think there is more in me than he discovers, and that I do not hold my tongue for nothing.

For these and other reasons I shall set out for London to-morrow, having found by experience that the country is not a place for a person of my temper, who does not love jollity, and what they call good-neighborhood. A man that is out of humour when an unexpected guest breaks in upon him, and does not care for sacrificing an afternoon to every chance-comer; that will be the matter of his own time, and the pursuer of his own inclinations, makes but a very unsociable figure in this kind of life. I shall therefore retire into the town, if I may make use of that phrase, and get into the crowd again as fast as I can, in order to be alone. I can there raise what Speculations I please upon others, without being observed myself, and at the same time enjoy all the advantages of company with all the privileges of solitude. In the mean time to finish the month, and conclude these my rural Speculations, I shall shall here insert a letter from my friend Will Honeycomb, who has not lived a month for these forty years out of the smoke of London, and rallies me after his way upon my country life.

Dear Spec.

"I suppose this letter will find thee picking of daffies, or smelling to a lock of hay, or pasting away thy time in some innocent country diversion of the like nature. I have however orders from the Club to summon thee up to town, being all of us curiously afraid thou wilt not be able to relish our company, after thy conversations with Moll White and Will Wimbie. Pr'ythee don't send us up any more stories of a cock and a bull, nor frighten the town with spirits and witches. Thy Speculations begin to smell confoundedly of woods and meadows. If thou dost not come up quickly, we shall conclude thou art in love with one of Sir Roger's dairy maids. Service to Knight. Sir Andrew is grown the cock of the Club since he left us, and if he does not return quickly, will make every mother's son of us common-wealths men.

Dear Spec, thine eternally,

Will Honeycomb.

Est brevitate opus, ut curat semen.--Hor.

I have somewhere read of an eminent person, who used in his private offices of devotion to give thanks to Heaven that he was born a Frenchman: for my own part I look upon it as a peculiar blessing that I was born an Englishman. Among many other reasons, I think my self very happy in my country, as the language of it is wonderfully adapted to a man who is sparing of his words, and an enemy to loquacity.

As I have frequently reflected on my good fortune in this particular, I shall communicate to the publick my Speculations upon the English tongue, tongue, not doubting but they will be acceptable to all my curious Readers.

The English delight in silence more than any other European nation; if the remarks which are made up us by foreigners are true. Our discourse is not kept up in conversation, but falls into more pauses and intervals than in our neighbouring countries; as it is observed, that the matter of our writings is thrown much closer together, and lies in a narrower compass than is usual in the works of foreign Authors: for, to favour our natural taciturnity, when we are obliged to utter our thoughts, we do it in the shortest way we are able, and give as quick a birth to our conceptions as possible.

This humour shews it self in several remarks that we may make upon the English language. As first of all by its abounding in monosyllables, which gives us an opportunity of delivering our thoughts in few sounds. This indeed takes off from the elegance of our tongue, but at the same time expresses our ideas in the readiest manner, and consequentily answers the first design of speech better than the multitude of syllables, which make the words of other languages more tunable and honorous. The sounds of our English words are commonly like those of singing music, short and transient, which rise and perish upon a single touch; those of other languages are like the notes of wind instruments, sweet and swelling, and lengthened out into variety of modulation.

In the next place we may observe, that where the words are not monosyllables, we often make them so, as much as lies in our power, by our rapidity of pronunciation; as it generally happens in most of our long words which are derived from the Latin, where we contract the length of the syllables that gives them a grave and solemn air in their own language, to make them more proper for dispatch, and more conformable to the genius of our tongue. Thus we may find in a multitude of words, as Liberty, Conspiracy, Theatre, Orator &c.

The same natural aversion to loquacity has of late years made a very considerable alteration in our language, by cloising in one syllable the termination of ourpreterperfect tense, as in the words drowned, walked, arrived, for drowned, walked, arrived, which has very much disfigured the tongue, and turned a tenth part of our smoothest words into so many clusters of consonants. This is the more remarkable, because the want of vowels in our language has been the general complaint of our politest Authors, who nevertheless are the men that have made these refinements, and consequentily very much increased our former scarcity. This

This reflection on the words that end in ed, I have heard in conversation from one of the greatest genius's this age has produced. I think we may add to the foregoing observation, the change which has happened in our language, by the abbreviation of several words that are terminated in ed, by substituting an s in the room of the last syllable, as in drawns, weeks, arrives, and innumerable other words, which in the pronunciation of our fore-fathers were drawneth, walketh, arriveth. This has wonderfully multiplied a letter which was before too frequent in the English tongue, and added to that hissing in our language, which is taken so much notice of by foreigners, but at the same time humours our tautology, and eases us of many superfluous syllables.

I might here observe, that the same single letter on many occasions does the office of a whole word, and represents the His and Her of our fore-fathers. There is no doubt but the ear of a foreigner, which is the best judge in this case, would very much disapprove of such innovations, which indeed we do ourselves in some measure, by retaining the old termination in writing, and in all the solemn offices of our religion.

As in the instances I have given we have epitomized many of our particular words to the detriment of our tongue, so on other occasions we have drawn two words into one, which has likewise very much untuned our language, and clogged it with consonants, as mayn't, can't, shan't, won't, and the like, for may not, can not, shall not, will not, &c.

It is perhaps this humour of speaking no more than we needs must, which has so miserably curtailed some of our words, that in familiar writings and conversations they often lose all but their first syllables, as in mob, rep, pos, insac, and the like; and as all ridiculous words make their first entry into a language by familiar phrases, I dare not answer for these that they will not in time be looked upon as a part of our tongue.

We see some of our Poets have been so indiscreet as to imitate Hudibras's doggrel expressions in their serios compositions, by throwing out the signs of our substantives, which are essential to the English language. Nay, this humour of shortening our language had once run so far, that some of our celebrated Authors, among whom we may reckon Sir Roger L'Estrange in particular, began to prune their words of all superfluous letters, as they termed them, in order to adjust the spelling to the pronunciation; which would have confounded all our etymologies, and have quite destroyed our tongue.

We may here likewise observe, that our proper names, when familiarized in English, generally dwindle to monosyllables, whereas in other modern modern languages, they receive a softer turn on this occasion, by the addition of a new syllable. Nick in Italian is Niccolini, Jack in French Jeanot; and so of the rest.

There is another particular in our language which is a great instance of our frugality in words, and that is the suppressing of several particles which must be produced in other tongues to make a sentence intelligible: this often perplexes the best writers, when they find the relatives whom, which, or they, at their mercy whether they may have admission or not; and will never be decided till we have something like an Academy, that by the best authorities and rules drawn from the analogy of languages, shall settle all controversies between grammar and idiom.

I have only considered our language as it shews the genius and natural temper of the English, which is modest, thoughtful and sincere, and which perhaps may recommend the people, though it has spoiled the tongue. We might perhaps carry the same thought into other languages, and deduce a great part of what is peculiar to them from the genius of the people who speak them. It is certain the light talkative humour of the French, has not a little infected their tongue, which might be shewn by many instances; as the genius of the Italians, which is so much addicted to music and ceremony, has moulded all their words and phrases to those particular uses. The flatness and gravity of the Spaniards shews it fell to perfection in the solemnity of their language; and the blunt honest humour of the Germans sounds better in the roughness of the High Dutch, than it would in a politer tongue.

---Omnem qua nunc obduxeris tenui
Mortales bebetis visus tibi, et humida circum
Caligat, nubem eripiam---

Virg.

When I was at Grand Cairo I picked up several oriental Manuscripts, which I have fill by me. Among others I met with one entituled, The Visions of Mirza, which I have read over with with great pleasure. I intend to give it to the publick, when I have no other entertainment for them; and shall begin with the first Vision, which I have translated word for word as follows.

"On the fifth day of the moon, which according to the custom of my forefathers I always keep holy, after having washed my self, and offered up my morning devotions, I ascended the high hills of Bagdat, in order to pass the rest of the day in meditation and prayer.
As I was thus musing, I cast my eyes towards the summit of a rock that was not far from me, where I discovered one in the habit of a shepherd, with a musical instrument in his hand.
As I looked upon him he applied it to his lips, and began to play upon it. The sound of it was exceeding sweet, and wrought into a variety of tunes that were inexpressibly melodious, and altogether different from any thing I had ever heard. They put me in mind of those heaven ly airs that are played to the departed souls of good men upon their first arrival in paradise, to wear out the impressions of their last ago nies, and qualify them for the pleasures of that happy place. My heart melted away in secret raptures.

"I had been often told that the rock before me was the haunt of a Genius; and that several had been entertained with musick who had passed by it, but never heard that the musician had before made him self visible. When he had raised my thoughts, by those transporting airs which he played, to taste the pleasures of his conversation, and I looked upon him like one astonished, he beckoned to me, and by the waving of his hand directed me to approach the place where he sat.
I drew near with that reverence which is due to a superior nature;
and as my heart was entirely subdued by the captivating strains I had heard, I fell down at his feet and wept. The Genius smiled upon me with a look of compassion and affability that familiarized him to my imagination, and at once dispelled all the fears and apprehensions with which I approached him. He lifted me from the ground, and taking me by the hand, Minzah, said he, I have heard thee in thy colloquies, follow me.

"He then led me to the highest pinnacle of the rock, and placing me on the top of it, Cast thy eyes eastward, said he, and tell me what thou " felt.
I see, said I, a huge valley and a prodigious tide of water rolling through it. The valley that thou seest, said he, is the vale of misery, and the tide of water that thou seest is part of the great tide of Eternity. What is the reason, said I, that the tide I see rises out of a thick mist at one end, and again loses itself in a thick mist at the other? What thou seest, said he, is that portion of Eternity which is called Time, measured out by the Sun, and reaching from the beginning of the world to its consummation. Examine now, said he, this sea that is thus bounded with darkness at both ends, and tell me what thou discoverest in it. I see a bridge, said I, standing in the midst of the tide. The bridge thou seest, said he, is humane life, consider it attentively. Upon a more leisurely survey of it, I found that it consisted of threefores and ten entire arches, with several broken arches, which added to those that were entire, made up the number about an hundred.

As I was counting the arches the Genius told me that this bridge consisted at first of a thousand arches; but that a great flood swept away the rest, and left the bridge in the ruinous condition I now beheld it. But tell me further, said he, what thou discoverest on it. I see multitudes of people passing over it, said I, and a black cloud hanging on each end of it. As I looked more attentively, I saw several of the passengers dropping through the bridge, into the great tide, that flowed underneath it; and upon further examination, perceived there were innumerable trap-doors that lay concealed in the bridge, which the passengers no sooner trod upon, but they fell through them into the tide and immediately disappeared. These hidden pitfalls were set very thick at the entrance of the bridge, so that throngs of people no sooner broke through the cloud, but many of them fell into them. They grew thinner towards the middle, but multiplied and lay closer together towards the end of the arches that were entire.

There were indeed some persons, but their number was very small, that continued a kind of hobbling march on the broken arches, but fell through one after another, being quite tired and spent with so long a walk.

I paused some time in the contemplation of this wonderful structure, and the great variety of objects which it presented. My heart was filled with a deep melancholy to see several dropping unexpectedly in the midst of mirth and jollity, and catching at every thing that stood by them to save themselves. Some were looking up towards the Heavens in a thoughtful posture, and in the midst of a speculation stumbled and fell out of sight. Multitudes were very busy in the pursuit of hubbles that glittered in their eyes and danced before them; but often when they thought themselves within the reach of them, their footing failed and down they funk. In this confusion of objects, I observed some with Scymetars in their hands, and others with Urinals, who ran to and from upon the bridge, thrufing several persons on trap-doors which did not seem to lie in their way, and which they might have escaped had they not been thus forced upon them.

The Genius seeing me indulge my self in this melancholy prospect, told me I had dwelt long enough upon it: Take thine eyes off the bridge, said he, and tell me if thou sees any thing thou dost not comprehend. Upon looking up, What mean, said I, those great flocks of birds that are perpetually hovering about the bridge, and settling upon it from time to time? I see vultures, harpies, ravens, cormorants, and among many other feathered creatures several little winged boys, that perch in great numbers upon the middle arches. These, said the Genius, are envy, avarice, superstition, despair, love, with the like cares and passions that infect humane life.

I here fetched a deep sigh; Alas, said I, man was made in vain! How is he given away to misery and mortality! tormented in life, and swallowed up in death! The Genius being moved with compassion towards me, bid me quit so uncomfortable a prospect. Look no more, said he, on man in the first stage of his existence; in his setting out for Eternity; but cast thine eye on that thick mist into which the tide bears the several generations of mortals that fall into it. I directed my sight as I was ordered, and (whether or no the good Genius strengthened it with any supernatural force, or dissipated part of the mist that was be-tore too thick for the eye to penetrate) I saw the valley opening at the further end, and spreading forth into an immense ocean, that had a huge rock of Adamant running through the midst of it, and dividing it into two equal parts. The clouds still rested on one half of it, inromuch that I could discover nothing in it: but the other appeared to me a vast ocean planted with innumerable islands, that were covered with fruits and flowers, and interwoven with a thousand little shining seas that ran among them. I could see persons drest in glorious habits with garlands upon their heads, passing among the trees, lying down by the sides of fountains, or reclining on beds of flowers;
and could hear a confused harmony of singing birds, falling waters, hu-manc voices, and musical instruments. Gladness grew in me upon the discovery of so delightful a scene. I wished for the wings of an eagle, that I might fly away to those happy seats; but the Genius told me there was no passage to them, except through the gates of Death that I saw opening every moment upon the bridge. The islands, said he, that lie so fresh and green before thee, and with which the whole face of the ocean appears spotted as far as thou canst see, are more in number than the sands on the sea-shore; there are myriads of islands behind those which thou here discoverest, reaching further than thine eye or even thine imagination can extend itself. These are the mansions of good men after death, who according to the degree and kinds of virtue in which they excelled, are distributed among these several islands, which abound with pleasures of different kinds and degrees, suitable to the relishes and perfections of those who are settled in them; every island is a paradise accommodated to its respective inhabitants. Are not these, O Mirza, habitations worth contending for? Does life appear miserable, that gives thee opportunities of earning such a reward? Is death to be feared, that will convey thee to so happy an existence? Think not man was made in vain, who has such an Eternity reserved for him. I gazed with inexpressible pleasure on these happy islands. At length said I, show me now, I beseech thee, the secret that lies hid under those dark clouds which cover the ocean on the other side of the rock of Adamant. The Genius making me no answer, I turned about to address my self to him a second time, but I found that he had left me; I then turned again to the vision which I had been so long contemplating, but instead of the rolling tide, the arched bridge, and the happy islands, I saw nothing but the long hollow valley of Bagdat, with oxen, sheep, and camels, grazing upon the sides of it.

The end of the first vision of Mirza.

Cui mens divinior, arque os
Magna sonaturum, des nominis hujus bonorem. Hor.

There is no character more frequently given to a writer, than that of being a Genius. I have heard many a little sonneteer called a fine Genius. There is not an heroic scribler in the nation, that has not his admirers who think him a great Genius; and as for your finmatterers in Tragedy, there is scarce a man among them who is not cried up by one or other for a prodigious Genius.

My design in this paper is to consider what is properly a great Genius, and to throw some thoughts together on so uncommon a subject.

Among great Genius's, those few draw the admiration of all the world upon them, and stand up as the prodigies of mankind, who by the mere strength of natural parts, and without any assistance of art or learning, have produced works that were the delight of their own times, and the wonder of posterity. There appears something nobly wild and extravagant in these great natural Genius's, that is infinitely more beautiful than all the turn and polishing of what the French call a Bel Esprit, by which they would express a Genius refined by conversation, reflection, and the reading of the most polite Authors. The greatest Genius which runs through the arts and sciences, takes a kind of tincture from them, and falls unavoidably into imitation.

Many of these great natural Genius's that were never disciplined and broken by rules of art, are to be found among the ancients, and in particular among those of the more eastern parts of the world. Homer has innumerable flights that Virgil was not able to reach, and in the Old Testament we find several passages more elevated and sublime than any in Homer. At the same time that we allow a greater and more daring Genius to the ancients, we must own that the greatest of them very much failed in, or, if you will, that they were much above, the nicety and correctness of the moderns. In their similitudes and allusions, provided there was a likeness, they did not much trouble themselves about the decency of the comparison: thus Solomon resembles the nose of his beloved to the tower of Lebanon which looketh toward Damascus; as the coming of a thief in the night, is a similitude of the same kind in the New Testament. It would be endless to make collections of this nature: Homer illustrates one of his heroes encompassed with the enemy, by an ass in a field of corn, that has his sides belaboured by all the boys of the village without flitting a foot for it; and another of them tolling to and fro in his bed and burning with relentment, to a piece of flesh broiled on the coals. This particular failure in the ancients, opens a large field of raillery to the little wits, who can laugh at an indecency, but not relish the sublime in these sorts of writings. The present Emperor of Persia, conformable to this eastern way of thinking, amidst a great many pompous titles denominates himself the Sun of glory and the Nutmeg of delight. In short, to cut off all cavilling against the ancients, and particularly those of the warmer climates, who had most heat and life in their imaginations, we are to consider that the rule of observing what the French call the Bienfaisance in an allusion, has been found out of latter years, and in the colder regions of the world; where we would make some amends for our want of force and spirit, by a scrupulous nicety and exactness in our compositions. Our countryman Shakespeare was a remarkable instance of this first kind of great Genius's. I cannot quit this head without observing that Pindar was a great Genius of the first Clafs, who was hurried on by a natural fire and impetuousity to vast conceptions of things, and noble fancies of imagination. At the same time, can any thing be more ridiculous than for men of a sober and moderate fancy to imitate this Poet's way of writing in those monstrous compositions which go among us under the name of Pindaricks? When I see people copying works, which, as Horace has represented them, are singular in their kind and inimitable; when I see men following irregularities by rules, and by the little tricks of art straining after the most unbounded flights of nature, I cannot but apply to them that passage in Lorenzo:

---incerta hec est te postulest--- Ratione certa facibus, nihil o poesia
Quinti des operam, ut cum ratione infantiae.
In short, a modern Pindarick writer compared with Pindar, is like a stammer among the Cymyars compared with Virgil's Sibyl: there is the distortion, grimace, and outward figure, but nothing of that divine impulse which raises the mind above itself, and makes the sounds more than human.

There is another kind of great Genius's which I shall place in a second class, not as I think them inferior to the first, but only for distinction's sake as they are of a different kind. This second class of great Genius's are those that have formed themselves by rules, and submitted the greatness of their natural talents to the corrections and restraints of art. Such among the Greeks were Plato and Aristotle, among the Romans Virgil and Tully, among the English Milton and Sir Francis Bacon.

The genius in both these classes of Authors may be equally great, but shows itself after a different manner. In the first it is like a rich foil in a happy climate, that produces a whole wilderness of noble plants rising in a thousand beautiful landscapes without any certain order or regularity. In the other it is the same rich foil under the same happy climate, that has been laid out in walks and parterres, and cut into shape and beauty by the skill of the gardener.

The great danger in these latter kind of Genius's, is, lest they cramp their own abilities too much by imitation, and form themselves altogether upon models, without giving the full play to their own natural parts. An imitation of the best Authors is not to compare with a good original; and I believe we may observe that very few writers make an extraordinary figure in the world, who have not something in their way of thinking or expressing themselves that is peculiar to them, and entirely their own.

It is odd to consider what great Genius's are sometimes thrown away upon trifles.

I once saw a shepherd, says a famous Italian Author, who used to divert himself in his solitudes with tossing up eggs and catching them again without breaking them: In which he had arrived to so great a degree of perfection, that he would keep up four at a time for several minutes together playing in the air, and falling into his hand by turns. I think, says the Author, I never saw a greater severity than in this man's face; for by his wonderful perseverance and application, he had contracted the seriousness and gravity of a Privy-councilor: I could not but reflect with my self, that the same affluence and attention, had they been rightly applied, might have made him a greater mathematician than Archimedes.

NO
tHING that is not a real crime makes a man appear so contemptible and little in the eyes of the world as Inconstancy, especially when it regards religion or party. In either of these cases, though a man perhaps does but his duty in changing his fide, he not only makes himself hated by those he left, but is seldom heartily esteem'd by those he comes over to.

In these great articles of life therefore a man's conviction ought to be very strong, and if possible so well timed that worldly advantages may seem to have no share in it, or mankind will be ill-natured enough to think he does not change sides out of principle, but either out of levity of temper, or prospects of interest. Converts and renegadoes of all kinds should take particular care to let the world see they act upon honourable motives; or whatever approbations they may receive from themselves, and applauses from those they converse with, they may be very well affured that they are the scorn of all good men, and the publick marks of infamy and derision.

Irresolution on the schemes of life which offer themselves to our choice, and inconstancy in pursuing them, are the greatest and most univeral causes of all our disquiet and unhappiness. When ambition pulls one way, interest another, inclination a third, and perhaps reason contrary to all, a man is likely to pass his time but ill who has so many dif-frent parties to please. When the mind hovers among such a variety of allurements, one had better settle on a way of life that is not the very best we might have chosen, than grow old without determining our choice, and go out of the world, as the greatest part of mankind do, before we have resolved how to live in it. There is but one method of setting our selves at rest in this particular, and that is by adhering sted-
fauly to one great end as the chief and ultimate aim of all our pursuits. If we are firmly resolved to live up to the dictates of reason, without any regard to wealth, reputation, or the like considerations, any more than as they fall in with our principal design, we may go through life with steadiness and pleasure; but if we act by several broken views, and will not only be virtuous, but wealthy, popular, and every thing that has a value set upon it by the world, we shall live and die in misery and repentance.

One would take more than ordinary care to guard ones self against this particular imperfection, because it is that which our nature very strongly inclines us to; for if we examine ourselves thoroughly, we shall find that we are the most changeable Beings in the universe. In respect of our understanding, we often embrace and reject the same opinions; whereas Beings above and beneath us have probably no opinions at all, or at least no wavering and uncertainties in those they have. Our superiors are guided by intuition, and our inferiors by instinct. In respect of our wills, we fall into crimes, and recover out of them, are amiable or odious in the eyes of our great Judge, and pass our whole life in offending and asking pardon. On the contrary, the Beings under us are not capable of sinning, nor those above us of repenting. The one is out of the possibilities of duty, and the other fixed in an eternal course of fin, or an eternal course of virtue.

There is scarce a state of life, or stage in it, which does not produce changes and revolutions in the mind of man. Our schemes of thought in infancy are lost in those of youth; these too take a different turn in manhood, till old age often leads us back into our former infancy. A new title or an unexpected success throws us out of our selves, and in a manner destroys our identity. A cloudy day or a little sun-shine have as great an influence on many constitutions, as the most real blessings or misfortunes. A dream varies our being, and changes our condition while it lasts; and every passion, not to mention health and sickness, and the greater alterations in body and mind, makes us appear almost different creatures. If a man is to distinguished among other Beings by this infirmity, what can we think of such as make themselves remarkable for it even among their own species? It is a very trifling character to be one of the most variable Beings of the most variable kind, especially if we consider that he who is the great standard of perfection, has in him no shadow of changes, but is the same yesterday, to day, and for ever.
As this mutability of temper and inconstancy, with our selves, is the greatest weakness of human nature, so it makes the Person who is remarkable for it, in a very particular manner more ridiculous than any other infirmity whatsoever, as it sets him in a greater variety of foolish lights, and distinguishes him from himself by an opposition of party-coloured characters. The most humorous character in Horace is founded upon this unevenness of temper and irregularity of conduct.

Instead of translating this passage in Horace, I shall entertain my English Reader with the description of a parallel character, that is wonderfully well finished by Mr. Dryden, and raised upon the same foundation.

In the first rank of these did Zimri stand:
A man so various, that he seemed to be
Not one, but all mankind's epitome.
Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong;
Was every thing by starts, and nothing long;
But, in the course of one revolving moon,
Was Chymist, Fiddler, Statesman, and Buffoon:
Then all for women, painting, rhyming, drinking;
Besides ten thousand fads that dy'd in thinking.
Blest madman, who could'ry every hour employ,
With something new to wish, or to enjoy!

Si quid ego adjuvem, curamus levasse,
Quae nunc te coquir, et versat sub pectore fixa,

Enn. ap. Tullium.

Enquiries after happiness, and rules for attaining it, are not so necessary and useful to mankind as the arts of consolation, and supporting oneself under affliction. The utmost we can hope for in this world is contentment; if we aim at anything higher, we shall meet with nothing but grief and disappointments. A man should direct all his studies and endeavours at making himself easy now, and happy hereafter.

The truth of it is, if all the happiness that is dispersed through the whole race of mankind in this world were drawn together, and put into the possession of any single man, it would not make a very happy Being. Though on the contrary, if the miseries of the whole species were fixed in a single person they would make a very miserable one.

I am engaged in this subject by the following letter, which, though subscribed by a fictitious name, I have reason to believe is not imaginary.

Mr. Spectator,

I am one of your disciples, and endeavour to live up to your rules; which I hope will enrol you to pity my condition: I shall open it to you in a very few words. About three years since a Gentleman, whom, I am sure, you yourself would have approved, made his address to me. He had everything to recommend him but an estate, so that my friends, who all of them applauded his person, would not for the sake of both of us favour his passion. For my own part I resigned myself up entirely to the direction of those who knew the world much better than myself, but still lived in hopes that some juncture or other would make me happy in the man whom, in my heart,

I preferred to all the world; being determined if I could not have him, to have no body else. About three months ago I received a letter.

O ter
ter from him, acquainting me, that by the death of an uncle he had a considerable estate left him, which he said was welcome to him upon no other account, but as he hoped it would remove all difficulties that lay in the way to our mutual happiness. You may well suppose, Sir, with how much joy I received this letter, which was followed by several others filled with those expressions of love and joy, which I verily believe no body felt more sincerely, nor knew better how to decribe, than the Gentleman I am speaking of. But, Sir, how shall I be able to tell it you! by the last week's post I received a letter from an intimate friend of this unhappy Gentleman, acquainting me, that as he had just settled his affairs, and was preparing for his journey, he fell sick of a fever and died. It is impossible to express to you the distress I am in upon this occasion, I can only have recourse to my devotions, and to the reading of good books for my consolation; and as I always take a particular delight in those frequent advices and admonitions which you give the publick, it would be a very great piece of charity in you to lend me your affiitude in this conjuncture. If after the reading of this letter you find yourself in a humour rather to rally and ridicule, than to comfort me, I desire you would throw it into the fire, and think no more of it; but if you are touched with my misfortune, which is greater than I know how to bear, your counsels may very much support, and will infinitely oblige the afflicted.

LEONORA.

A disappointment in love is more hard to get over than any other; the passion it stirs to fortifies and saddles the heart, that it disposes it from struggling or bearing up against the woes and distresses which beset it.
The mind meets with other misfortunes in her whole strength; the hands collected within her self, and sustains the shock with all the force which is natural to her; but a heart in love has its foundations rvapped, and immediately sinks under the weight of accidents that are disagreeable to its favourite passion.

In afflictions men generally draw their confections out of books of morality, which indeed are of great use to fortify and strengthen the mind against the impressions of sorrow. Montier St. Evremont, who does not approve of this method, recommends Authors who are apt to tir up mirth in the mind of the readers, and fancies Don Quixote can give more relief to an heavy heart than Plutarch or Seneca, as it is much easier to divert grief than to conquer it. This doubtless may have its its effects on some tempers. I should rather have recourse to Authors of a quite contrary kind, that give us instances of calamities and misfortunes, and shew human nature in its greatest difficulties.

If the affliction we groan under be very heavy, we shall find some consolation in the society of as great sufferers as ourselves, especially when we find our companions men of virtue and merit. If our afflictions are light, we shall be comforted by the comparisons we make between our selves and our fellow-sufferers. A loss at sea, a fit of sickness, or the death of a friend, are such trifles when we consider whole Kingdoms laid in ashes, families put to the sword, wretches shut up in dungeons, and the like calamities of mankind, that we are out of countenance for our own weaknesses, if we sink under such little strokes of fortune.

Let the disconsolate Leonora consider, that at the very time in which she languishes for the loss of her deceased lover, there are perfons in several parts of the world just perishing in a Shipwreck; others crying out for mercy in the terrors of a death-bed repentance; others lying under the tortures of an infamous execution, or the like dreadful calamities; and she will find her sorrows vanish at the appearance of those which are so much greater and more astonishing.

I would further propose to the consideration of my afflicted disciple, that possibly what she now looks upon as the greatest misfortune, is not really such in itself. For my own part, I question not but our fathers in a separate state will look back on their lives in quite another view, than what they had of them in the body; and that what they now consider as misfortunes and disappointments, will very often appear to have been escapes and blessings.

The mind that hath any cast towards devotion, naturally flies to it in its afflictions.

When I was in France, I heard a very remarkable story of two lovers, which I shall relate at length in my to-morrow's paper, not only because the circumstances of it are extraordinary, but because it may serve as an illustration to all that can be said on this last head, and shew the power of religion in abating that particular anguish which seems to lie so heavy on Leonora. The story was told me by a Priest, as I travelled with him in a stage-coach. I shall give it my Reader, as well as I can remember, in his own words, after having premised, that if consolations may be drawn from a wrong religion and a misguided devotion, they cannot but flow much more naturally from those which are founded upon reason, and established in good sense.

Friday,
CONSTANTIA was a woman of extraordinary wit and beauty, but very unhappy in a father, who having arrived at great riches by his own industry, took delight in nothing but his money. THEOdOsiUS was the younger son of a decayed family, of great parts and learning, improved by a genteel and virtuous education. When he was in the twentieth year of his age, he became acquainted with CONSTANTIA, who had not then passed her fifteenth. As he lived but a few miles distance from her father’s house, he had frequent opportunities of seeing her; and by the advantages of a good person and a pleasing conversation, made such an impression in her heart as it was impossible for time to efface: he was himself no less smitten with CONSTANTIA. A long acquaintance made them find discover new beauties in each other, and by degrees raised in them that mutual passion which had an influence on their following lives. It unfortunately happened, that in the midst of this intercourse of love and friendship between THEODOSIUS and CONSTANTIA, there broke out an irreparable quarrel between their parents, the one valuing himself too much upon his birth, and the other upon his possessions. The father of CONSTANTIA was so incensed at the father of THEODOSIUS, that he contracted an unreasonable aversion towards his son, insomuch that he forbade him his house, and charged his daughter upon her duty never to see him more. In the mean time, to break off all communication between the two lovers, who he knew entertained secret hopes of some favourable opportunity that should bring them together, he found out a young Gentleman of a good fortune and an agreeable person, whom he pitched upon as a husband for his daughter. He soon concerted this affair so well, that he told CONSTANTIA it was his design to marry her to such...
such a Gentleman, and that her wedding should be celebrated on such a day. Constantia, who was over-awed with the authority of her father, and unable to object any thing against so advantageous a match, received the proposal with a profound silence, which her father commended to her, as the most decent manner of a virgin's giving her consent to an overture of that kind. The noise of this intended marriage soon reached Theodorus, who after a long tumult of passions which naturally rife in a lover's heart on such an occasion, writ the following letter to Constantia.

"THE thought of my Constantia, which for some years has been my only happiness, is now become a greater torment to me than I am able to bear. Must I then live to see another's? the streams, the fields and meadows, where we have so often talked together, grow painful to me; life itself is become a burden. May you long be happy in the world, but forget that there was ever such a man in it as

This letter was conveyed to Constantia that very evening, who fainted at the reading of it; and the next morning she was much more alarmed by two or three messengers, that came to her father's house one after another to enquire, if they had heard any thing of Theodorus, who it seems had left his chamber about midnight, and could no where be found. The deep melancholy which had hung upon his mind some time before, made them apprehend the worst that could befal him. Constantia, who knew that nothing but the report of her marriage could have driven him to such extremities, was not to be comforted: she now accused her self for having so tamely given an ear to the proposal of a husband, and looked upon the new lover as the murderer of Theodorus: in short, she resolved to suffer the utmost effects of her father's displeasure, rather than comply with a marriage which appeared to her so full of guilt and horror. The father seeing himself entirely rid of Theodorus, and likely to keep a considerable portion in his family, was not very much concerned at the obstinate refusal of his daughter; and did not find it very difficult to excuse himself upon that account to his intended son-in-law, who had all along regarded this alliance rather as a marriage of convenience than of love. Constantia had now no relief but in her devotions and exercises of religion, to which her afflictions had so entirely subjected her mind, that after some years had abated the violence of her sorrows, and
and settled her thoughts in a kind of tranquillity, she resolved to pass the remainder of her days in a convent. Her father was not displeased with a resolution, which would save money in his family, and readily complied with his daughter's intentions. Accordingly in the twenty fifth year of her age, while her beauty was yet in all its height and bloom, he carried her to a neighbouring city, in order to look out a sisterhood of Nuns among whom to place his daughter. There was in this place a father of a convent who was very much renowned for his piety and exemplary life; and as it is usual in the Roman church for those who are under any great affliction, or trouble of mind, to apply themselves to the most eminent Confessors for pardon and consolation, our beautiful votary took the opportunity of confessing her self to this celebrated father.

We must now return to Theodosius, who the very morning that the above-mentioned enquiries had been made after him, arrived at a religious house in the city, where now Constantia resided; and desiring that secrecy and concealment of the fathers of the convent, which is very usual upon any extraordinary occasion, he made himself one of the order, with a private vow never to enquire after Constantia; whom he looked upon as given away to his rival upon the day on which, according to common fame, their marriage was to have been solemnized. Having in his youth made a good progress in learning, that he might dedicate himself more entirely to religion he entered into holy orders, and in a few years became renowned for his sanctity of life, and those pious sentiments which he inspired into all who conversed with him. It was this holy man to whom Constantia had determined to apply her self in confession, though neither she nor any other besides the Prior of the convent, knew any thing of his name or family. The gay, the amiable Theodosius had now taken upon him the name of father Francis; and was so far concealed in a long beard, a shaven head, and a religious habit, that it was impossible to discover the man of the world in the venerable conventual.

As he was one morning shut up in his confessional, Constantia kneeling by him, opened the slate of her soul to him; and after having given him the history of a life full of innocence, she burst out into tears, and entered upon that part of her story, in which he himself had so great a share. My behaviour, says she, has I fear been the death of a man who had no other fault but that of loving me too much. Heaven only knows how dear he was to me whilst he lived, and how bitter the remembrance of him has been to me since his death. She here paused, and lifted up her... her eyes that streamed with tears towards the father; who was so moved with the sense of her sorrows, that he could only command his voice, which was broke with sighs and sobs, to be so as to bid her proceed.
She followed his directions, and in a flood of tears poured out her heart before him. The father could not forbear weeping aloud, incommut that in the agonies of his grief the tears shook under him. Constantia, who thought the good man was thus moved by his compassion towards her, and by the horror of her guilt, proceeded with the utmost contrition to acquaint him with that vow of virginity in which she was going to engage her self, as the proper atonement for her sins, and the only sacri-cifice she could make to the memory of Theodorus. The father, who by this time had pretty well composed himself, burst out again in tears upon hearing that name to which he had been so long diffused, and upon receiving this instance of an unparalleled fidelity from one who he thought had several years since given her self up to the possession of another.
Amidst the interruptions of his sorrow, seeing his penitent overwhelmed with grief, he was only able to bid her from time to time be comforted—to tell her that her sins were forgiven her—that her guilt was not so great as she apprehended—that she should not suffer her self to be afflicted above measure. After which he recovered himself enough to give her the absolution in form; directing her at the same time to repair to him again the next day, that he might encourage her in the pious resolutions she had taken, and give her suitable exhortations for her behaviour in it. Constantia retired, and the next morning renewed her applications. Theodorus having manned his soul with proper thoughts and reflections, exerted himself on this occasion in the best manner he could to animate his penitent in the course of life she was entering upon, and wear out of her mind those groundless fears and apprehensions which had taken possession of it; concluding, with a promise to her, that she would from time to time continue his admonition when she should have taken upon her the holy veil. The rules of our respective orders, says he, will not permit that I should see you, but you may assure your self not only of having a place in my prayers, but of receiving such frefquent instructions as I can convey to you by letters. Go on cheerfully in the glorious course you have undertaken, and you will quickly find such a peace and satisfaction in your mind, which it is not in the power of the world to give.

Constantia's heart was so elevated with the discourse of father Francis, that the very next day she entered upon her vow. As soon as she lemnities.

Leannities of her reception were over, she retired, as it is usual, with the Abbe[s] into her own apartment.

The Abbess had been informed the night before of all that had passed between her Noviciate and father Francis: From whom she now de-erived to her the following letter.

S the first fruits of these joys and consolations which you may expect from the life you are now engaged in, I must acquaint you that Theodosius, whole death sits so heavy upon your thoughts, is still alive; and that the father to whom you have confessed your self, was once that Theodosius whom you so much lament.

The love which we have had for one another will make us more hap-cy in its disappointment, than it could have done in its success. Providence has disposed of us for our advantage, though not according to our wishes. Consider your Theodosius still as dead, but allure your self of one who will not cease to pray for you in father

FRANCIS.

Constantia saw that the handwriting agreed with the contents of the letter: and upon reflecting on the voice of the person, the behaviour, and above all the extreme sorrow of the father during her confession, she discovered Theodosius in every particular. After having wept with tears of joy, It is enough, says she, Theodosius is still in being; I shall live with comfort and die in peace.

The letters which the father sent her afterwards are yet extant in the Nunnery where she resided; and are often read to the young religious, in order to inspire them with good resolutions and sentiments of virtue. It so happened, that after Constantia had lived about ten years in the cloister, a violent fever broke out in the place, which swept away great multitudes, and among others Theodosius. Upon his death-bed he sent his benediction in a very moving manner to Constantia; who at that time was her self so far gone in the same fatal distemper, that she lay delirious. Upon the interval which generally precedes death in sicknesses of this nature, the Abbess finding that the Physicians had given her over, told her that Theodosius was just gone before her, and that he had sent her his benediction in his last moments. Constantia received it with pleasure: And now, says she, if I do not ask any thing improper, let me be buried by Theodosius.
My vow reaches no farther than the grave. What I ask is, I hope, no violation of it.—She died soon after, and was interred according to her request.

Their
Their tombs are still to be seen, with a short Latin inscription over them to the following purpose.

Here lie the bodies of father Francis and sister Constance. They were lovely in their lives, and in their deaths were not divided.

Si forte necesse est;

Continget: dabiturque licentia sumpta pudenter.

Hor.

I have often wished, that as in our constitution there are several persons whose business it is to watch over our laws, our liberties and commerce, certain men might be set apart as superintendents of our language, to hinder any words of a foreign coin from passing among us; and in particular to prohibit any French phrases from becoming current in this kingdom, when those of our own stamp are altogether as valuable. The present war has so adulterated our tongue with strange words, that it would be impossible for one of our great-grand-fathers to know what his posterity have been doing, were he to read their exploits in a modern newspaper. Our warriors are very industrious in propagating the French language, at the same time that they are so gloriously successful in beating down their power. Our soldiers are men of strong heads for action, and perform such feats as they are not able to express. They want words in their own tongue to tell us what they achieve, and therefore send us over accounts of their performances in a jargon of phrases, which they learn among their conquered enemies. They ought however to be provided with Secretaries, and allotted by our foreign Ministers, to tell their story for them in plain English, and to let us know in our mother-tongue what it is our brave country-men are about. The French would indeed be in the right to publish the news of the present war in English phrases, and make their campaigns unintelligible. Their people might flatter themselves that things are not so bad as they really are, were they thus palliated with foreign terms, and thrown into shades and obscurity: but

the English cannot be too clear in their narrative of those actions, which have raised their country to a higher pitch of glory than it ever yet arrived at, and which will be still the more admired, the better they are explained.

For my part, by that time a siege is carried on two or three days, I am altogether lost and bewildered in it, and meet with so many inexplicable difficulties, that I scarce know which side has the better of it, till I am informed by the Tower guns that the place is surrendered. I do indeed make some allowances for this part of the war, fortifications having been foreign inventions, and upon that account abounding in foreign terms. But when we have won battles which may be described in our own language, why are our papers filled with so many unintelligible exploits, and the French obliged to lend us a part of their tongue before we can know how they are conquered? They must be made accedant to their own disgrace, as the Britains were formerly so artificially wrought in the curtain of the Roman theatre, that they seemed to draw it up, in order to give the spectators an opportunity of seeing their own defeat celebrated upon the stage; For so Mr. Dryden has translated that verse in Virgil, Atque inter texti tollent aulae Britanniae.

Which interwoven Britains seem to raise,
And show the triumph that their shame displays.

The histories of all our former wars are transmitted to us in our vernacular Idiom, to use the phrase of a great modern critic. I do not find in any of our chronicles, that Edward the Third ever reconnoitred the enemy, though he often discovered the posture of the French, and as often vanquished them in battle. The Black Prince passed many a river without the help of pontoons, and filled a ditch with faggots as successfully as the Generals of our times do it with Fascines. Our Commanders lose half their praise, and our people half their joy, by means of those hard words and dark expressions in which our newspapers do so much abound. I have seen many a prudent Citizen, after having read every article, enquire of his next neighbour what news the mail had brought.

I remember in that remarkable year when our country was delivered from the greatest fears and apprehensions, and raised to the greatest height of gladness it had ever felt since it was a nation; I mean the year of
of Blenheim, I had the copy of a letter sent me out of the country, which was written from a young gentleman in the army to his father, a man of a good estate and plain sense: as the letter was very modestly chequered with this modern military eloquence, I shall present my Reader with a copy of it.

"UPON the junction of the French and Bavarian armies they took post behind a great morass which they thought impracticable. Our General the next day sent a party of horse to reconnoitre them from a little hauteur, at about a quarter of an hour's distance from the army, who returned again to the camp unobserved through several defiles, in one of which they met with a party of French that had been marauding, and made them all prisoners at discretion. The day after a drum arrived at our camp, with a message which he would communicate to none but the General; he was followed by a trumpet, who they say behaved himself very facetiously, with a message from the Duke of Bavaria. The next morning our army being divided into two corps, made a movement towards the enemy: you will hear in the publick prints how we treated them, with the other circumstances of that glorious day. I had the good fortune to be in the regiment that pulled the Gens d'Arms. Several French battalions, who some say were a Corps de Reserve, made a show of resistance; but it only proved a gaufnoade, for upon our preparing to fill up a little Boisse, in order to attack them, they beat the Chamade, and sent us charte Blanche. Their Commandant, with a great many other General Officers, and troops without number, are made prisoners of war, and will I believe give you a visit in England, the Cartel not being yet settled. Not questioning but these particulars will be very welcome to you, I congratulate you upon them, and am your most dutiful Son, &c.

The father of the young gentleman upon the perusal of the letter found it contained great news, but could not guess what it was. He immediately communicated it to the Curate of the parish, who upon the reading of it, being vexed to see any thing he could not understand, fell into a kind of passion, and told him, that his son had sent him a letter that was neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring. I wish, says he, the Captain may be compositus mentis, he talks of a saucy trumpet, and a drum that carries messages; then who is this charte Blanche? he must either banter.
ter us, or he is out of his senses. The father, who always looked upon the Curate as a learned man, began to fret inwardly at his son’s usage, and producing a letter which he had written to him about three posts afore, You see here, says he, when he writes for money, he knows how to speak intelligibly enough; there is no man in England can express himself clearer, when he wants a new furniture for his horse. In short, the old man was so puzzled upon the point, that it might have fared ill with his son, had he not seen all the prints about three days after filled with the same terms of art, and that Charles only writ like other men.

Aristotle tells us, that the world is a copy or transcript of those ideas which are in the mind of the first Being, and those ideas which are in the mind of man, are a transcript of the world; to this we may add, that words are the transcript of those ideas which are in the mind of man, and that writing or printing is the transcript of words.

As the supreme Being has expressed, and as it were printed his ideas in the Creation, men express their ideas in books, which by this great invention of these latter ages, may last as long as the Sun and Moon, and perish only in the general wreck of nature. Thus Cowley in his Poem on the Resurrection, mentioning the destruction of the universe, has those admirable lines.

Now all the wide extended sky,
And all the harmonious worlds on high,
And Virgil’s sacred work shall die.

There is no other method of fixing those thoughts which arise and disappear in the mind of man, and transmitting them to the last periods of time; no other method of giving a permanency to our ideas, and pre-preferring the knowledge of any particular person, when his body is mixed with the common mass of matter, and his soul retired into the world of spirits. Books are the legacies that a great genius leaves to mankind, which are delivered down from generation to generation, as presents to the posterity of those who are yet unborn.

All other arts of perpetuating our ideas continue but a short time:
Statues last but a few thousands of years, Edifices fewer, and Colours still fewer than Edifices. Michael Angelo, Fontana and Raphael, will hereafter be what Phidias, Vitruvius, and Apelles are at present; the names of great Statuaries, Architects, and Painters, whose works are lost. The several arts are expressed in moulding materials; Nature sinks under them, and is not able to support the ideas which are impressed upon it.

The circumstance which gives Authors an advantage above all these great matters, is this, that they can multiply their originals; or rather can make copies of their works, to what number they please, which shall be as valuable as the originals themselves. This gives a great Author something like a prospect of Eternity, but at the same time deprives him of those other advantages which Artists meet with. The Artist finds greater returns in Profit, as the Author in Fame. What an inestimable price would a Virgil or a Homer, a Cicero or an Aristotle bear, were their works like a Statue, a Building, or a Picture, to be confined only in one place, and made the property of a single person.

If writings are thus durable, and may pass from age to age throughout the whole course of time, how careful should an Author be of committing anything to print that may corrupt posterity, and poison the minds of men with vice and error? Writers of great talents, who employ their parts in propagating immorality, and seasoning vicious sentiments with wit and humour, are to be looked upon as the pests of society and the enemies of mankind: They leave books behind them (as it is said of those who die in dittemper which breed an ill-will towards their own species) to scatter infection and destroy their posterity.
They set the counter-parts of a Confucius or a Socrates; and seem to have been sent into the world to deprave human nature, and sink it into the condition of brutality.

I have seen some Roman-catholick Authors, who tell us, that vicious writers continue in Purgatory so long as the influence of their writings continues upon posterity: For Purgatory, say they, is nothing else but a cleaning us of our sins, which cannot be said to be done away, so long as...
as they continue to operate and corrupt mankind. The vicious Author, say they, sins after death, and so long as he continues to sin, so long must he expect to be punished. Though the Roman-catholic notion of Purgatory be indeed very ridiculous, one cannot but think that if the Soul after death has any knowledge of what passes in this world, that of an immoral Writer would receive much more regret from the sense of corrupting, than satisfaction from the thought of pleasing, his surviving admirers.

To take off from the severity of this Speculation, I shall conclude this paper with a story of an atheistical Author, who at a time when he lay dangerously sick, and had desir'd the assistance of a neighbouring Curate, confessed to him with great contrition, that nothing sat more heavy at his heart than the sense of his having seduced the Age by his writings, and that their evil influence was likely to continue even after his death. The Curate upon further examination finding the penitent in the utmost agonies of despair, and being himself a man of learning, told him, that he hoped his case was not so desperate as he apprehended, since he found that he was so very sensible of his fault, and so sincerely repent'd of it. The penitent still urg'd the evil tendency of his book to subvert all religion, and the little ground of hope there could be for one whose writings would continue to do mischief when his body was laid in ashes. The Curate finding no other way to comfort him, told him, that he did well in being afflicted for the evil design with which he publish'd his book; but that he ought to be very thankful that there was no danger of its doing any hurt. That his case was so very bad and his arguments so weak, that he did not apprehend any ill effects of it. In short, that he might rest satisfied that his book could do no more mischief after his death, than it had done whilst he was living. To which he added, for his further satisfaction, that he did not believe any besides his particular friends and acquaintance had ever been at the pains of reading it, or that any body after his death would ever enquire after it. The dying man had still so much of the frailty of an Author in him, as to be cut to the heart with these consolations; and without answering the good man, asked his friends about him (with a peevishness that is natural to a sick person) where they had picked up such a block-head? and whether they thought him a proper person to attend one in his condition? The Curate finding that the Author did not expect to be dealt with as a real and sincere penitent, but as a penitent of importance, after a short admonition withdrew; not questioning but he should be again fent for if the sicknees grew
The author, however, recovered, and has since written two or three other tracts with the same spirit, and very luckily for his poor soul with the same success.

Sic vita erat: facile omnes persever ac pati: Cum quibus erat cumque una, his sese dedere, Eorum obequi studis: adversus nemini; Nunc qui rem atque suo alici. Ita facillime Sine incridia invenias laudem.——

Tec. And.

Man is subject to innumerable pains and sorrows by the very condition of humanity, and yet, as if Nature had not sown evils enough in life, we are continually adding grief to grief, and aggravating the common calamity by our cruel treatment of one another. Every man's natural weight of affliction is still made more heavy by the envy, malice, treachery or injustice of his neighbour. At the same time that the flom beats on the whole Species, we are falling foul upon one another.

Half the misery of human life might be extinguished, would men alleviate the general curse they lie under, by mutual offices of compassion, benevolence and humanity. There is nothing therefore which we ought more to encourage in our selves and others, than the disposition of mind which in our language goes under the title of Good-nature, and which I shall chuse for the subject of this day's Speculation.

Good-nature is more agreeable in conversation than Wit, and gives a certain air to the countenance which is more amiable than Beauty. It shews virtue in the fairest light, takes off in some measure from the deformity of vice, and makes even folly and impertinence supportable.

There is no society or conversation to be kept up in the world without Good-nature, or something which must bear its appearance, and supply its place, for this reason mankind have been forced to invent a kind of
of artificial humanity, which is what we express by the word Good Breeding. For if we examine thoroughly the idea of what we call so, we shall find it to be nothing else but an imitation and mimicry of Good-nature, or in other terms, affability, complaisance and easiness of temper reduced into an art.

These exterior shows and appearances of humanity render a man wonderfully popular and beloved, when they are founded upon a real Good-nature; but without it are like Hypocrisie in Religion, or a bare form of holiness, which when it is discovered makes a man more detestable than professed Impiety.

Good-nature is generally born with us; health, prosperity and kind treatment from the world are great cherishers of it where they find it, but nothing is capable of forcing it up, where it does not grow of itself. It is one of the blessings of a happy constitution, which education may improve but not produce.

Xenophon in the life of his imaginary Prince, whom he describes as a pattern for real ones, is always celebrating the (Philanthropy or) Good-nature of his Hero, which he tells us he brought into the world with him, and gives many remarkable instances of it in his childhood, as well as in all the several parts of his life. Nay, on his death-bed, he describes him as being pleased, that while his Soul returned to him who made it, his Body should incorporate with the Great Mother of all things, and by that means become beneficial to mankind. For which reason he gives his sons a positive order not to enshrine it in gold or silver, but to lay it in the earth as soon as the life was gone out of it.

An instance of such an overflowing of humanity, such an exuberant love to mankind, could not have entered into the imagination of a writer, who had not a soul filled with great ideas, and a general benevolence to mankind.

In that celebrated passage of Salust, where Cæsar and Cato are placed in such beautiful, but opposite lights; Cæsar's character is chiefly made up of Good-nature, as it shewed it self in all its forms towards his friends or his enemies, his servants or dependants, the guilty or the disposed. As for Cato's character, it is rather awful than amiable. Justice seems most agreeable to the nature of God, and Mercy to that of Man. A Being who has nothing to pardon in himself, may reward every man according to his works; but the whole very best actions must be seen with grains of allowance, cannot be too mild, moderate and forgiving. For this reason, among all the monitrous characters in human nature, there is is none so odious, nor indeed so exquisitely ridiculous, as that of a rigid severe temper in a worthless man.

This part of Good-nature, however, which consists in the pardoning and over-looking of faults, is to be exercised only in doing our selves Justice, and that too in the ordinary commerce and occurrences of life;
for in the publick administrations of Justice, Mercy to one may be Cruelty to others.

It is grown almost into a maxim, that Good-natured men are not always men of the most wit. The observation, in my opinion, has no foundation in Nature. The greatest Wits I have conversed with are men eminent for their Humanity. I take therefore this remark to have been occasioned by two reasons. First, because Ill-nature among ordinary observers passes for Wit. A skilful saying gratifies so many little passions in those who hear it, that it generally meets with a good reception. The laugh rises upon it, and the man who utters it is looked upon as a shrewd Satyriff. This may be one reason, why a great many pleasant companions appear so surprizingly dull, when they have endeavoured to be merry in print; the publick being more just than private clubs or attembles, in distinguishing between what is Wit and what is Ill-nature.

Another reason why the Good-natured man may sometimes bring his wit in question, is perhaps, because he is apt to be moved with compassion for those misfortunes and infirmities, which another would turn into ridicule, and by that means gain the reputation of a Wit. The Ill-natured man, though but of equal parts, gives himself a larger field to expatiate in, he exposes the failings in human nature which the other would cast a veil over, laughs at vices which the other either excuses or conceals, gives utterance to reflections which the other stifles, falls indif-ferently upon friends or enemies, exposes the person who has obliged him, and in short tickles at nothing that may establish his character as a Wit. It is no wonder therefore he succeeds in it better than the man of humanity, as a person who makes use of indirect methods is more likely to grow rich than the fair trader.
UPON looking over the Letters of my female correspondents, I find several from women complaining of jealous husbands, and at the same time protesting their own innocence; and deeming my advice on this occasion, I shall therefore take this subject into my consideration; and the more willingly, because I find that the Marquess of Halifax, who, in his Advice to a Daughter, has instructed a wife how to behave herself towards a false, an intemperate, a choleric, a fullen, a covetous or a silly husband, has not spoken one word of a jealous husband.

Jealousy is that pain which a man feels from the apprehension that he is not equally beloved by the person whom he entirely loves. Now, because our inward passions and inclinations can never make themselves visible, it is impossible for a jealous man to be thoroughly cured of his suspicions. His thoughts hang at best in a state of doubtfulness and uncertainty; and are never capable of receiving any satisfaction on the advantageous side; so that his enquiries are most successful when they discover nothing: his pleasure arises from his disappointments, and his life is spent in pursuit of a secret that destroys his happiness if he chance to find it.

An ardent love is always a strong ingredient in this passion; for the same affection which fills up the jealous man's desires, and gives the party beloved so beautiful a figure in his imagination, makes him believe she kindles the same passion in others, and appears as amiable to all beholders. And as Jealousy thus arises from an extraordinary love, it is of so delicate a nature, that it cannot take up with any thing less than an equal return of love. Not the warmest expressions of affection, the folest and most tender hypocrify, are able to give any satisfaction, where we are not perfumud that the affection is real and the satisfaction mutual. For the jealous man wishes himself a kind of Deity to the person he loves: he would be the only pleasure of her senses, the employment of her thoughts; and is angry at every thing she admires, or takes delight in, besides himself.

Phedria's request to his mistress, upon his leaving her for three days, is inimitably beautiful and natural.

Cum milite isto presens, absens ut sis:
Dixi, adulescere me ames: me desideres:
Me vomis: mea exspectes: de me cogires:
Me speres: me te oblethes: mecum tota sis:

The jealous man's disease is of so malignant a nature, that it converts all he takes into its own nourishment. A cool behaviour sets him on the rack, and is interpreted as an instance of aversion or indifference; a fond one raises his suspicions, and looks too much like dissimulation and artifice. If the person he loves be cheerful, her thoughts must be employed on another; and if sad, she is certainly thinking on himself. In short, there is no word or gesture so insignificant, but it gives him new hints, feeds his suspicions, and furnishes him with fresh matters of discovery: so that if we consider the effects of this passion, one would rather think it proceeded from an inveterate hatred than an excessive love; for certainly none can meet with more disquietude and uneasiness than a suspected wife, if we except the jealous husband.

But the great unhappiness of this passion is, that it naturally tends to alienate the affection which it is so solicitous to engross; and that for these two reasons: because it lays too great a restraint on the words and actions of the suspected person; and at the same time shews you have no honourable opinion of her; both of which are strong motives to aversion.

Nor is this the worst effect of Jealousy: for it often draws after it a more fatal train of consequences, and makes the person you suspect guilty of the very crimes you are so much afraid of. It is very natural for such who are treated ill and upbraided falsely, to find out an intimate friend that will bear their complaints, condole their sufferings, and endeavour to soothe and allay their secret resentments. Besides, Jealousy puts a woman often in mind of an ill thing that she would not otherwise perhaps perhaps have thought of, and fills her imagination with such an unlucky idea, as in time grows familiar, excites desire, and loses all the shame and horror which might at first attend it. Nor is it a wonder, if the who suffers wrongfully in a man's opinion of her, and has therefore nothing to forfeit in his esteem, resolves to give him reason for his suspicions, and to enjoy the pleasure of the crime, since she must undergo the ignominy. Such probably were the considerations that directed the wife man in his advice to husbands; Be not jealous over the wife of thy bosom, and teach her not an evil lesson against thy self: Ecelul.

And here, among the other torments which this passion produces, we may usually observe that none are greater mourners than jealous men, when the person who provoked their jealousy is taken from them. Then it is that their love breaks out furiously, and throws off all the mixtures of suspicion which choked and smothered it before. The beautiful parts of the character rise uppermost in the jealous husband's memory, and upbraid him with the ill usage of so divine a creature as was once in his possession; whilst all the little imperfections that were before so uneasy to him, wear off from his remembrance, and shew themselves no more.

We may see by what has been said, that Jealousy takes the deepest root in men of amorous dispositions; and of these we find three kinds who are most over-run with it.

The first are those who are conscious to themselves of any infirmity, whether it be weakness, old age, deformity, ignorance, or the like. These men are so well acquainted with the unamiable part of themselves, that they have not the confidence to think they are really beloved; and are so distrustful of their own merits, that all fondness towards them puts them out of countenance, and looks like a jest upon their persons. They grow suspicious on their first looking in a glass, and are stung with jealousy at the sight of a wrinkle. A handsome fellow immediately alarms them, and every thing that looks young or gay turns their thoughts upon their wives.

The second sort of men, who are most liable to this passion, are those of cunning, wary, and distrustful tempers. It is a fault very justly found in histories composed by Politicians, that they leave nothing to chance or humour, but are still for deriving every action from some plot or contrivance, from drawing up a perpetual scheme of causes and events, and preferring a constant correspondence between the Camp and the Council-table. And thus it happens in the affairs of love with men of too refined finite a thought. They put a construction on a look, and find out a design in a smile; they give new senses and significations to words and actions; and are ever tormenting themselves with fancies of their own raising: they generally act in a disguise themselves, and therefore mistake all outward shows and appearances for hypocrisy in others; so that I believe no men see less of the truth and reality of things, than these great refiners upon incidents, who are so wonderfully subtle and over-wise in their conceptions.

Now what these men fancy they know of women by reflection, your lewd and vicious men believe they have learned by experience. They have seen the poor husband so misled by tricks and artifices, and in the midst of his enquiries so lost and bewildred in a crooked intrigue, that they still suspect an under-plot in every female action; and especially where they see any resemblance in the behaviour of two persons, are apt to fancy it proceeds from the same design in both. These men therefore bear hard upon the suspected party, pursue her close through all her turnings and windings, and are too well acquainted with the chase, to be hung off by any false steps or doubles: besides, their acquaintance and conversation has lain wholly among the vicious part of womenkind, and therefore it is no wonder they centure all alike, and look upon the whole sex as a species of impostors. But if, notwithstanding their private experience, they can get over these prejudices, and entertain a favourable opinion of some women; yet their own loose desires will stir up new suspicions from another side, and make them believe all men subject to the same inclinations with themselves.

Whether these or other motives are most predominant, we learn from the modern histories of America, as well as from our own experience in this part of the world, that jealousy is no Northern passion, but rages most in those nations that lie nearest the influence of the Sun. It is a misfortune for a woman to be born between the Tropicks; for there lie the hottest regions of jealousy, which as you come northward cool all along with the climate, till you scarce meet any thing like it in the polar Circle. Our own nation is very temperately situated in this respect; and if we meet with some few disorder'd with the violence of this passion, they are not the proper growth of our country, but are many degrees nearer the Sun in their constitution than in their climate.

After this frightful account of Jealousy, and the persons who are most subject to it, it will be but fair to shew by what means the passion may be best allayed, and those who are possessed with it set at ease. Other faults faults indeed are not under the wife's jurisdiction, and should, if possible, escape her observation; but Jealousy calls upon her particularly for its care, and deferves all her art and application in the attempt: besides, she has this for her encouragement, that her endeavours will be always pleasing, and that she will still find the affection of her husband rising towards her in proportion as his doubts and suspicions vanish; for, as we have seen all along, there is so great a mixture of love in jealousy as is well worth the separating. But this shall be the subject of another paper.

N° 171. Saturday, September 15.

Credula res amor est——— Ovid. Met.

Having in my yesterday's paper discovered the nature of Jealousy, and pointed out the persons who are most subject to it, I must here apply myself to my fair correspondents, who desire to live well with a jealous husband, and to ease his mind of its unjust suspicions.

The first rule I shall propose to be observed is, that you never seem to dislike in another what the jealous man is himself guilty of, or to admire anything in which he himself does not excel. A jealous man is very quick in his applications, he knows how to find a double edge in an invective, and to draw a Satyr on himself out of a Panegyric on another. He does not trouble himself to consider the person, but to direct the character; and is secretly pleased or confounded as he finds more or less of himself in it. The commendation of any thing in another, stirs up his Jealousy, as it shews you have a value for others besides himself; but the commendation of that which he himself wants, inflames him more, as it shews that in some respects you prefer others before him. Jealousy is admirably described in this view by Horace in his Ode to Lydia.

Quam tu, Lydia, Telephi
Cervicem rosum, et cerea Telephi
Landas brachia, ut meum
Fervens difficiili bile tulerit iecur:

Thus
Tunc nee mens mihi, nee color
Certè fade manet; humor et in genas
Furtim labitur arguens
Quam levis penitus maceret ignibus.

When Telephus his youthful charms,
His rose neck and winding arms,
With endless rapture you recite,
And in that pleasing name delight;
My heart, inflam'd by jealous beats,
With numberless resentments beats;
From my pale cheek the colour flies,
And all the man within me dies:
By turns my hidden grief appears
In rising sighs and falling tears,
That shew too well the warm desires,
The silent, slow, consuming fires,
Which on my inmost vitals prey.
And melt my very Soul away.

The jealous man is not indeed angry if you dislike another; but if you find those faults which are to be found in his own character, you discover not only your dislike of another, but of himself. In short, he is so desirous of engrossing all your love, that he is grieved at the want of any charm, which he believes has power to raise it; and if he finds, by your cenfures on others, that he is not so agreeable in your opinion as he might be, he naturally concludes you could love him better if he had other qualifications, and that by consequence your affection does not rise so high as he thinks it ought. If therefore his temper be grave or full, you must not be too much pleased with a jeff, or transported with any thing that is gay and diverting. If his beauty be none of the belt, you must be a professed admirer of prudence, or any other quality he is matter of, or at least vain enough to think he is.

In the next place, you must be sure to be free and open in your conversation with him, and to let in light upon your actions, to unravel all your designs, and discover every secret however trifling or indifferent. A jealous husband has a particular aversion to winks and whispers, and if he does not see to the bottom of every thing, will be sure to go beyond it in his fears and suspicions. He will always expect to be your chief confidant, and where he finds himself kept out of a secret, will believe there is more in it than there should be. And here it is of great concern, that you preserve the character of your sincerity uniform and of a piece; for if he once finds a false gloss put upon any single action, he quickly suspects all the rest; his working imagination immediately takes a false hint, and runs off with it into several remote consequences, till he has proved very ingenious in working out his own misery.

If both these methods fail, the best way will be to let him see you are much cast down and afflicted for the ill opinion he entertains of you, and the difquietaudes he himself suffers for your sake. There are many who take a kind of barbarous pleasure in the jealousy of those who love them, that insult over an aking heart, and triumph in their charms which are able to excite so much uneafines.
I shall conclude this Essay with the story of Herod and Mariamne, as I have collected it out of Josephus; which may serve almost as an example to whatever can be said on this subject.

Mariamne had all the charms that beauty, birth, wit and youth could give a woman, and Herod all the love that such charms are able to raise in a warm and amorous disposition. In the midst of this his fondness for Mariamne, he put her brother to death, as he did her father not many years after. The barbarity of the action was represented to Mark Antony, who immediately summoned Herod into Egypt, to answer for the crime that was there laid to his charge. Herod attributed the summons to Antony's desire of Mariamne, whom therefore before his depart ure he gave into the custody of his uncle Joseph, with private orders to put her to death, if any such violence was offered to himself. This Joseph was much delighted with Mariamne's conversation, and endeavoured with all his art and rhetoric to set out the excess of Herod's passion for her: but when he still found her cold and inconsiderate, he inconsiderately told her, as a certain instance of her Lord's affection, the private orders he had given to him, which plainly shewed, according to Joseph's interpretation, that he could neither live nor die without her. This barbarous instance of a wild unreasonable passion, quite put out, for a time, those little remains of affection she still had for her Lord: for now her thoughts were so wholly taken up with the cruelty of his orders, that she could not consider the kindness that produced them, and therefore represented him in her imagination, rather under the frightful idea of a murderer than a lover. Herod was at length acquitted and dismissed by Mark Antony, when his soul was all in flames for his Mariamne; but before their meeting, he was not a little alarmed at the report he had heard of his uncle's conversation and familiarity with her in his absence. This therefore was the first discourse he entertained her with, in which she found it no easy matter to quiet his suspicions. But at last he appeared so well satisfied of her innocence, that from reproaches and wranglings he fell to tears and embraces. Both of them wept very tenderly at their reconciliation, and Herod poured out his whole soul to her in the warmest professions of love and constancy; when midst all his sighs and languishings she asked him, whether the private orders he left with his uncle Joseph were an instance of such an inflamed affection. The jealous King was immediately roused at so unexpected a question, and concluded his uncle must have been too familiar with her, before he would have discovered such a secret. In short, he put his uncle to death, and very difficultly prevailed upon himself to spare Marianne.

After this he was forced on a second journey into Egypt, when he committed his Lady to the care of Sobemus, with the same private orders he had before given his uncle, if any mischief befel himself. In the mean while Marianne so won upon Sobemus by her presents and obliging conversation, that she drew all the secret from him, with which Herod had intrusted him; so that after his return, when he flew to her with all the transports of joy and love, she received him coldly with frowns and tears, and all the marks of indifferency and aversion. This reception so stirred up his indignation, that he had certainly slain her with his own hands, had not he feared he himself should have become the greater sufferer by
it. It was not long after this, when he had another violent return of love upon him; Marianne was therefore sent for to him, whom he endeavoured to soften and reconcile with all possible conjugal careffies and endearments; but she declined his embraces, and answered all his fondness with bitter invectives for the death of her father and her brother.
This behaviour so incensed Herod, that he very hardly refrained from striking her; when in the heat of their quarrel there came in a witness, suborned by some of Marianne's enemies, who accused her to the King of a design to poison him. Herod was now prepared to hear any thing in her prejudice, and immediately ordered her servant to be stretched upon the rack; who in the extremity of his tortures confessed, that his mistress's avention to the King arose from something Sobemus had told her;
but as for any design of poisoning, he utterly disown'd the least knowledge of it. This confession quickly proved fatal to Sobemus, who now lay under the same suspicions and sentence that Joseph had before him on the like occasion. Nor would Herod rest here; but accused her with great vehemence of a design upon his life, and by his authority with the judges, had her publicly condemned and executed. Herod soon after her death grew melancholy and dejected, retiring from the publick administration of affairs into a solitary forest, and there abandoning himself to all the black considerations which naturally arise from a passion made up of love, remorse, pity and despair. He used to rave for his Marianne, and to call upon her in his distracted fits; and in all probabilicity would soon have followed her, had not his thoughts been feazonably called off from so sad an object by publick storms, which at that time very nearly threatened him.

---- Remover feris monstra, ineque

IN a late paper I mentioned the project of an ingenious author for the erection of several handicraft prizes to be contended for by our British artisans, and the influence they might have towards the improvement of our several manufactures. I have since that been very surprized by the following advertisement which I find in the Post-Boy of the 11th instant, and again repeated in the Post-Boy of the 15th.

ON the 9th of October next will be run for upon Colehill-heath in Warwickshire, a plate of fix guineas value, 3 hours, by any horse, mare, or gelding that hath not won above the value of £1. the winning horse to be sold for £5 l. to carry 10 stone weight, if 14 hands high, if above or under, to carry or be allowed weight for inches, and to be entered Friday the 11th at the Swan in Colehill, before 6 in the evening. Also a plate of 6s. value to be run for by affes. The same day a gold ring to be grimm'd for by men.

The first of these diversions that is to be exhibited by the 10 l. race-horses, may probably have its use; but the two last, in which the affes and men are concerned, seem to me altogether extraordinary and unaccountable. Why they should keep running affes at Colehill, or how making mouths turns to account in Warwickshire, more than in any other parts of England, I cannot comprehend. I have looked over all the Olympic games, and do not find any thing in them like an affs-race, or a match at grinnig. However it be, I am informed that several affes are now kept in body-cloaths, and sweated every morning upon the heath, and that all the country fellows within ten miles of the Swan grinn an hour or two in their gaities every morning, in order to qualify themselves for the 9th of October. The prize which is proposed to be grimm'd for, has raised such an ambition among the common people of out-grinnig one another, that many very differing persons are afraid it should spoil most of the faces in the county; and that a Warwickshire man will be known by his grinn, as Roman catholicks imagine a Kentish man is by his Tail.
tail. The gold ring which is made the prize of deformity, is just the reverse of the golden apple that was formerly made the prize of beauty, and should carry for its pose the old Motto inverted,

Detur telriori.

Or to accommodate it to the capacity of the combatants,

The frightfulst Grinner,
Be the Winner.

In the mean while I would advise a Dutch painter to be present at this great controversy of faces, in order to make a collection of the most remarkable Grins that shall be there exhibited.

I must not here omit an account which I lately received of one of these grinning matches from a Gentleman, who, upon reading the above-mentioned advertisement, entertained a Coffee-house with the following narrative. Upon the taking of Namur, amongst other publick rejoicings made on that occasion, there was a gold ring given by a Whig Justice of Peace to be grinned for. The first competitor that entered the Lists was a black swarthy French man, who accidentally pulled that way, and being a man naturally of a withered look, and hard features, promised himself good success. He was placed upon a table in the great point of view, and looking upon the company like Milton's death,

His muscles were so drawn together on each side of his face, that he shewed twenty teeth at a Grin, and put the country in some pain, left a foreigner should carry away the honour of the day; but upon a further trial they found he was master only of the merry Grin.

The next that mounted the table was a Malecontent in those days, and a great master of the whole art of Grinning, but particularly excelling in the angry Grin. He did his part so well, that he is said to have made half a dozen women miscarry; but the Justice being apprized by one who stood near him, that the fellow who grinned in his face was a Jacobite, and being unwilling that a dissatisfied person should win the gold ring, and he looked upon as the best Grinner in the country, he ordered the Oaths to be tendered unto him upon his quitting the table, which the Grinner refusing, he was set aside as an unqualified person. There were several other Grotesques figures that presented themselves, which it would be too tedious to describe. I must not however omit a Plough-man, who lived lived in the further part of the county, and being very lucky in a pair of long-lanthorn-jaws, wrung his face into such a hideous grimace, that every feature of it appeared under a different distortion. The whole company stood astonished at such a complicated Grin, and were ready to align the prize to him, had it not been proved by one of his Antagonists that he had practised with Verjuice for some days before, and had a Crab found upon him at the very time of Grinning; upon which the best judges of Grinning declared it as their opinion, that he was not to be looked upon as a fair Grinner, and therefore ordered him to be set aside as a cheat.

The prize, it seems, fell at length upon a Cobbler, Giles Gargon by name, who produced several new Grins of his own invention, having been used to cut faces for many years together over his Latt. At the very first Grin he cast every humane feature out of his countenance, at the second he became the face of a Spout, at the third a Baboon, at the fourth the head of a Bafe-viol, and at the fifth a pair of Nut-crackers. The whole assembly wondered at his accomplishments, and bestowed the ring on him unanimously; but, what he esteemed more than all the rest, a country wench whom he had wooed in vain for above five years before, was so charmed with his Grins, and the applause which he received on all sides, that she married him the week following, and to this day wears the prize upon her finger, the Cobbler having made use of it as his wedding-ring.

This paper might perhaps seem very impertinent, if it grew serious in the conclusion. I would nevertheless leave it to the consideration of those who are the patrons of this monstrous trial of skill, whether or not they are not guilty, in some measure, of an affront to their species, in treating after this manner the Humane Face Divine, and turning that part of us, which has so great an image impressed upon it, into the image of a Monkey; whether the raising such silly competitions among the Ignorant, proposing prizes for such useless accomplishments, filling the common people’s heads with such baseless ambitions, and inspiring them with such absurd ideas of superiority and preeminence, has not in it something immoral as well as ridiculous.

Saturday,
IN one of my last week's papers I treated of Good-nature, as it is the effect of constitution; I shall now speak of it as it is a moral virtue.

The first may make a man easy in himself and agreeable to others, but implies no merit in him that is possessed of it. A man is no more to be praised upon this account, than because he has a regular pulse or a good digestion. This Good-nature however in the constitution, which Mr. Dryden somewhere calls a Milkiness of Blood, is an admirable ground-work for the other. In order therefore to try our Good-nature, whether it arises from the body or the mind, whether it be founded in the animal or rational part of our Nature, in a word, whether it be such as is entitled to any other reward, besides that secret satisfaction and contentment of mind which is essential to it, and the kind reception it procures us in the world, we must examine it by the following rules.

First, Whether it acts with steadiness and uniformity in sicknesses and health, in prosperity and in adversity; if otherwise, it is to be looked upon as nothing else but an irradiation of the mind from some new supply of spirits, or a more kindly circulation of the blood. Sir Francis Bacon mentions a cunning Solicitor, who would never ask a favour of a Great man before dinner; but took care to prefer his petition at a time when the party petitioned had his mind free from care, and his appetites in good humour. Such a transient temporary Good-nature as this, is not that Philanthropie, that love of mankind, which deserves the title of a moral virtue.

The next way of a man's bringing his Good-nature to the test, is, to consider whether it operates according to the rules of reason and duty:
For
For if, notwithstanding its general benevolence to mankind, it makes no distinction between its objects, if it exerts it self promiscuously towards the deserving and the undeserving, if it relieves alike the idle and the indigent, if it gives it self up to the first petitioner, and lights upon any one rather by chance than choice, it may pass for an amiable instinct, but must not assume the name of a moral virtue.

The third trial of Good-nature will be, the examining our selves, whether or no we are able to exert it to our own disadvantage, and employ it on proper objects, notwithstanding any little pain, want, or inconvenience which may arise to our selves from it: in a word, whether we are willing to risque any part of our fortune, or reputation, our health or care, for the benefit of mankind. Among all these expressions of Good-nature, I shall single out that which goes under the general name of Charity, as it consists in relieving the indigent; that being a trial of this kind which offers it self to us almost at all times and in every place.

I should propose it as a rule to every one, who is provided with any competency of fortune more than sufficient for the necessaries of life, to lay aside a certain proportion of his income for the use of the poor. This I would look upon as an offering to him who has a right to the whole, for the use of thos whom, in the passage hereafter mentioned, he has described as his own representatives upon earth. At the same time we should manage our charity with such prudence and caution, that we may not hurt our own friends or relations whilst we are doing good to thos who are strangers to us.

This may possibly be explained better by an example than by a rule.

Eugenius is a man of universal Good-nature, and generous beyond the extent of his fortune; but withal so prudent in the economy of his affairs, that what goes out in charity is made up by good management.

Eugenius has what the world calls two hundred pounds a year; but never values himself above ninepence, as not thinking he has a right to the tenth part, which he always appropriates to charitable uses. To this sum he frequently makes other voluntary additions, insomuch that in a good year, for such he accounts those in which he has been able to make greater bounties than ordinary, he has given above twice the sum to the fickle and indigent. Eugenius prescribes to himself many particular days of fasting and abstinence, in order to encrease his private bank of charity and sets aside what would be the current expenses of those times for the poor. He often goes afoot where his business calls him, and at the end of his walk has given a shilling, which in his ordinary methods of ex-
pence would have gone for coach-hire, to the first necessitous person that has fallen in his way. I have known him, when he has been going to a Play or an Opera, divert the money which was designed for that purpose, upon an object of charity whom he has met with in the street; and afterwards pass his evening in a coffee-house, or at a friend’s fireside, with much greater satisfaction to himself than he could have received from the most exquisite entertainments of the Theatre. By these means he is generous without impoverishing himself, and enjoys his estate by making it the property of others.

There are few men so cramped in their private affairs, who may not be charitable after this manner, without any disadvantage to themselves, or prejudice to their families. It is but sometimes sacrificing a diversion or convenience to the poor, and turning the usual course of our expenses into a better channel. This is, I think, not only the most prudent and convenient, but the most meritorious piece of charity, which we can put in practice. By this method we in some measure share the necessities of the poor at the same time that we relieve them, and make our selves not only their patrons, but their fellow-sufferers.

Sir Thomas Brown, in the last part of his Religio Medici, in which he describes his charity in several heroic instances, and with a noble heat of sentiments mentions that verse in the Proverbs of Solomon, He that giveth to the poor, lends to the Lord. “There is more Rhetorick in that one sentence, says he, than in a Library of Sermons; and indeed if those sentences were understood by the Reader with the same emphasis as they are delivered by the Author, we needed not those volumes of instructions, but might be honest by an epitome.

This passage of scripture is indeed wonderfully persuasive; but I think the same thought is carried much further in the New Testament, where our Saviour tells us in a most pathetic manner, that he shall hereafter regard the clothing of the naked, the feeding of the hungry, and the visitation of the imprisoned as offices done to himself, and reward them accordingly. Pursuant to those passages in holy Scripture, I have somewhere met with the epitaph of a charitable man, which has very much pleased me. I cannot recollect the words, but the sense of it is to this purpose: What I spent I lost; what I pollied is left to others; what I gave away remains with me.

Since I am thus intently engaged in sacred Writ, I cannot forbear making an extract of several passages which I have always read with great delight in the book of Job. It is the account which that holy man gives of his behaviour in the days of his prosperity, and if considered only as a humane composition, is a finer picture of a charitable and good-natured man than is to be met with in any other Author.

Oh that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preferred me: when his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness: when the Almighty was yet with me; when my children were about me: when I washed my feet with butter, and the rock poured out rivers of oil.

When the ear heard me, then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me it gave witness to me. Because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame; I was a father to the poor, and the cause which I knew not, I searched out. Did I not weep for him that was in trouble, was not my soul grieved for the poor? Let me be weighed in an even balance that God may know mine integrity. If I did despise the cause of my man-servant or of my maid-servant when they contended with me; what shall I do when God riseth up? and when he Visiteth, what shall I answer him? Did not he that made me in the womb make him? and did not one fashion us in the womb? If I have withheld the poor from his desire, or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail, or have eaten my bread alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof: If I have seen any perish for want of clothing, or any poor without covering; If his loins have not blessed me, and if he were not warmed with the fleece of my sheep: If I have lifted up my hand against the fatherless when I saw help in the gate; then let mine arm fall from my shoulder-blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone. If I have rejoiced at the destruction of him that hated me; or lifted up my self when evil found him: (neither have I suffered my mouth to sin, by wishing a curse to his soul.) The stranger did not lodge in the street: but I opened my doors to the traveller. If my land cry against me, or that the furrows likewise thereof complain: If I have eaten the fruits thereof without money, or have caused the owners thereof to lose their lives: Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley.
May cast my Readers under two general divisions, the Mercurial and the Saturnine. The first are the gay part of my disciples, who require Speculations of wit and humour; the others are those of a more solemn and sober turn, who find no pleasure but in papers of Morality and sound sense. The former call every thing that is serious Stupid; the latter look upon every thing as impertinent that is ludicrous. Were I always grave, one half of my Readers would fall off from me; were I always merry, I should lose the other. I make it therefore my endeavour to find out entertainments for both kinds, and by that means perhaps consult the good of both; more than I should do, did I always write to the particular taste of either. As they neither of them know what I proceed upon, the sprightly Reader, who takes up my paper in order to be diverted, very often finds himself engaged uneasiness in a serious and profitable course of thinking; as on the contrary, the thoughtful man, who perhaps may hope to find something solid, and full of deep reflection, is very often insensibly betrayed into a fit of mirth.

In a word, the Reader sits down to my entertainment without knowing his bill of fare, and has therefore at least the pleasure of hoping there may be a dish to his palate.

I must confess, were I left to my self, I would rather aim at instructing than diverting; but if we will be useful to the world, we must take it as we find it. Authors of professed severity discourage the looser part of mankind from having any thing to do with their writings. A man must have virtue in him, before he will enter upon the reading of a Seneca or an Epictetus. The very title of a moral treatise has something in it affrrere and shocking to the careless and inconsiderate.
For this reason several unthinking persons fall in my way, who would give no attention to lectures delivered with a religious seriousness, or a philosophick gravity. They are inflected into sentiments of wildness and virtue when they do not think of it; and if by that means they arrive only at such a degree of consideration as may dispose them to listen to more studied and elaborate discourses, I shall not think my Speculations useless. I might likewise observe, that the gloominess in which sometimes the minds of the best men are involved, very often stands in need of such little incitements to mirth and laughter as are apt to diffuse melancholy, and put our faculties in good humour. To which some will add, that the British climate makes more than any other nations entertainments of this nature in a manner necessary.

If what I have here said does not recommend, it will at least excuse the variety of my Speculations. I would not willingly laugh but in order to instruct, or if I sometimes fail in this point, when my mirth ceases to be instructive, it shall never cease to be innocent. A scrupulous conduct in this particular, has, perhaps, more merit in it than the generality of readers imagine; did they know how many thoughts occur in a point of humour, which a discreet author in modestly suppresses; how many strokes of raillery present themselves, which could not fail to please the ordinary taste of mankind, but are stifled in their birth by reason of some remote tendency which they carry in them to corrupt the minds of those who read them; did they know how many glances of ill-nature are indifferently avoided for fear of doing injury to the reputation of another, they would be apt to think kindly of those writers who endeavour to make themselves diverting without being immoral. One may apply to these authors that passage in Walter,

Poets left half the praise they would have got,
Were it but known what they differently blot.

As nothing is more easy than to be a wit with all the above-mentioned liberties, it requires some genius and invention to appear such without them. What I have here said is not only in regard to the public, but with an eye to my particular correspondent who has sent me the following letter, which I have castrated in some places upon these considerations.

SIR,

"HAVING lately seen your discourse upon a match of Grinning, I cannot forbear giving you an account of a Whilling match, which, which, with many others, I was entertained with about three years since at the Bath. The prize was a guinea, to be conferred upon the ablest whiﬄer, that is, on him who could whiﬄe clearlest, and go through his tune without laughing, to which at the same time he was provoked by the antic postures of a Merry-Andrew, who was to stand upon the stage and play his tricks in the eye of the performer. There were three competitors for the guinea. The ﬁrst was a plowman of a very promising aspect; his features were steady, and his muscles composed into inﬁlexible a stupidity, that upon his ﬁrst appearance every one gave the guinea for lost. The pickled-herring however found the way to shake him, for upon his whiﬄing a country jig, this unlucky wag danced to it with such variety of distortions and grimaces, that the countryman could not forbear smiﬄing upon him, and by that means spoiled his whiﬄe and lost the prize.

"The next that mounted the stage was an under-citizen of the Bath, a person remarkable among the inferior people of that place for his great wisdom and his broad band. He contracted his mouth with much gravity, and, that he might dispose his mind to be more serious than ordinary, begun the tune of the children in the wood, and went through part of it with good success; when on a sudden the wit at his elbow, who had appeared wonderfully grave and attentive for some time, gave him a touch upon the left shoulder, and startled him in the face with so bewitching a grin, that the whiﬄer relaxed his ﬁbres into a kind of simper, and at length burst out into an open laugh. The third who entered the lists was a foot-man, who in defiance of the Merry-Andrew, and all his arts, whiﬄed a Scotch tune and an Italian Sonata, with so settled a countenance, that he bore away the prize; to the great admiration of some hundreds of persons, who, as well as myself, were present at this tryal of skill. Now, Sir, I humbly conceive, whatever you have determined of the grimmers, the whiﬄers ought to be encouraged, not only as their art is practiced without distortion, but as it improves country music, promotes gravity, and teaches ordinary people to keep their countenances, if they see anything ridiculous in their betters; besides that, it seems an entertainment very particularly adapted to the Bath, as it is usual for a rider to whiﬄe to his horse when he would make his waters pass."

I am, SIR, &c.

POST-
No. 179. The SPECTATOR.

POSTSCRIPT.

"After you have dispatched these two important points of Grisning and Whitting, I hope you will oblige the world with some reflections upon Yawning, as I have seen it practised on a twelfth-night among other Christmas gambols, at the house of a very worthy gentleman, who always entertains his tenants at that time of the year. They yawn for a Cheshire cheese, and begin about mid-night, when the whole company is disposed to be drowsy. He that yawns widest, and at the same time so naturally as to produce the most yawns among the spectators, carries home the cheese. If you handle this subject as you ought, I question not but your paper will set half the kingdom yawning, though I dare promise you it will never make any body fall asleep.

His lacrymis vitam damus, et misericimus ulter. Virg.

I am more pleased with a letter that is filled with touches of nature than of wit. The following one is of this kind.

SIR,

Among all the distresses which happen in families, I do not remember that you have touched upon the marriage of children without the consent of their parents. I am one of these unfortunate persons. I was about fifteen when I took the liberty to chuse for myself, and have ever since languished under the displeasure of an inexorable father, who, though he sees me happy in the best of husbands, and blest with very fine children, can never be prevailed upon to forgive me. He was so kind to me before this unhappy accident, that indeed it makes my breach of duty, in some measure, excusable; and at the same time creates in me such a tenderness towards him, that I love him above all things, and would die to be reconciled to him. I have thrown my self at his feet, and besought him with tears to par-
... do me; but he always pushes me away, and spurns me from him: I have written several letters to him, but he will neither open nor receive them. About two years ago I sent my little boy to him, dressed in a new apparel; but the child returned to me crying, because he said his grand-father would not see him, and had ordered him to be put out of his house. My mother is won over to my side, but dare not mention me to my father for fear of provoking him. About a month ago he lay sick upon his bed, and in great danger of his life: I was pierced to the heart at the news, and could not forbear going to enquire after his health. My mother took this opportunity of speaking in my behalf: She told him with abundance of tears, that I was come to see him, that I could not speak to her for weeping, and that I should certainly break my heart if he refused at that time to give me his blessing, and be reconciled to me. He was so far from relenting towards me, that he bid her speak no more of me, unless she had a mind to disturb him in his last moments; for, Sir, you must know that he has the reputation of an honest and religious man, which makes my misfortune so much the greater. God be thanked he is since recovered: but his severe usage has given me such a blow, that I shall soon sink under it, unless I may be relieved by any impressions which the reading of this in your paper may make upon him. I am, &c.

Of all hardness of heart, there is none so inexusable as that of parents towards their children. An obstinate, inflexible, unforgiving temper is odious upon all occasions, but here it is unnatural. The love, tenderness, and compassion which are apt to arise in us, towards those who depend upon us, is that by which the whole world of life is upheld. The supreme Being, by the transcendent excellency and goodness of his nature, extends his Mercy towards all his works; and because his creatures have not such a spontaneous benevolence and compassion towards those who are under their care and protection, he has implanted in them an instinct, that supplies the place of this inherent goodness. I have illustrated this kind of instinct in former papers, and have shewn how it runs through all the species of brute creatures, as indeed the whole animal creation subsists by it.

This instinct in man is more general and unconfined than in brutes, as being enlarged by the dictates of reason and duty. For if we consider our selves attentively, we shall find that we are not only enabled... to love those who descend from us, but that we bear a kind of (προρίσκων) or natural affection, to every thing which relies upon us for its good and preservation. Dependance is a perpetual call upon humanity, and a greater incitement to tenderness and pity than any other motive whatever.

The man therefore who, notwithstanding any passion or resentment, can overcome this powerful instinct, and extinguish natural affection, debates his mind even below brutality, frustrates, as much as in him lies, the great design of Providence, and strikes out of his nature one of the most divine principles that is planted in it.

Among innumerable arguments which might be brought against such an unreasonable Proceeding, I shall only insist on one. We make it the condition of our forgiveness that we forgive others. In our very prayers we desire no more than to be treated by this kind of retaliation. The case therefore before us seems to be what they call a Case in Point; the Relation between the child and father being what comes nearest to that between a creature and its Creator. If the father is inexorable to the child who has offended, let the offence be of never so high a nature, how will he address himself to the supreme Being, under the tender appellation of a father, and desire of him such a forgiveness as he himself refuses to grant?

To this I might add many other religious, as well as many prudential considerations; but if the last mentioned motive does not prevail, I despair of succeeding by any other, and shall therefore conclude my paper with a very remarkable story, which is recorded in an old chronicle published by Freher among the writers of the German history.

Eginhart, who was Secretary to Charles the Great, became exceeding popular by his behaviour in that post. His great abilities gained him the favour of his Master, and the esteem of the whole Court. Imma, the daughter of the Emperor, was so pleased with his person and conversation, that she fell in love with him. As she was one of the most beautiful beauties of the Age, Eginhart answered her with a more than equal return of passion. They kindled their flames for some time, under apprehension of the fatal consequences that might ensue. Eginhart at length revolving to hazard all, rather than live deprived of one whom his heart was so much set upon, conveyed himself one night into the Princess's apartment, and knocking gently at the door, was admitted as a person who had something to communicate to her from the Emperor. He was with her in private most part of the night; but upon his preparing to go away about break break of day, he observed that there had fallen a great snow during his stay with the Princess. This very much perplexed him, lest the prints of his feet in the snow might make discoveries to the King, who often used to visit his daughter in the morning. He acquainted the Princess Imma with his fears; who, after some consultations upon the matter, prevailed upon him to let her carry him through the snow upon her own shoulders. It happened, that the Emperor not being able to sleep, was at that time up and walking in his chamber, when upon looking through the window he perceived his daughter tottering under her burden, and carrying his first Minister across the snow: which she had no sooner done, but she returned again with the utmost speed to her own apartment. The Emperor was extremely troubled and astonished at this accident; but resolved to speak nothing of it till a proper opportunity. In the mean time Eginhart knowing that what he had done could not be long a secret, determined to retire from Court; and in order to it begged the Emperor that he would be pleased to dismiss him, pretending a kind of discontent at his not having been rewarded for his long services. The Emperor would not give a direct answer to his petition, but told him he would think of it, and appointed a certain day when he would let him know his pleasure. He then called together the most faithful of his Counsellors, and acquainting them with his Secretary’s crime, asked them their advice in so delicate an affair. They most of them gave their opinion, that the person could not be too severely punished who had thus dishonoured his Master. Upon the whole debate, the Emperor declared it was his opinion, that Eginhart’s punishment would rather encrease than diminish the shame of his family, and that therefore he thought it the most adviseable to wear out the memory of the fact, by marrying him to his daughter. Accordingly Eginhart was called in, and acquainted by the Emperor, that he should no longer have any pretence of complaining his services were not rewarded, for that the Princess Imma should be given him in marriage, with a Dowry suitable to her quality; which was soon after performed accordingly.

FABLES were the first pieces of wit that made their appearance in the world, and have been still highly valued, not only in times of the greatest simplicity, but among the most polite Ages of mankind. Jotham's Fable of the trees is the oldest that is extant, and as beautiful as any which have been made since that time. Nathan's Fable of the poor man and his lamb is likewise more ancient than any that is extant, besides the above-mentioned, and had so good an effect, as to convey instruction to the ear of a King without offending it, and to bring the man after God's own heart to a right sense of his guilt and his duty. We find Aesop in the most distant Ages of Greece; and if we look into the very beginning of the Common-wealth of Rome, we see a mutiny among the common people appeased by a Fable of the belly and the limbs, which was indeed very proper to gain the attention of an incensed rabble, at a time when perhaps they would have torn to pieces any man who had preached the same doctrine to them in an open and direct manner. As Fables took their birth in the very infancy of learning, they never flourished more than when learning was at its greatest height. To justify this assertion, I shall put my reader in mind of Horace, the greatest Wit and Critic in the Augustan Age; and of Boileau, the most correct Poet among the moderns: not to mention la Fontaine, who by this way of writing is come more into vogue than any other Author of our times.

The Fables I have here mentioned are raised altogether upon brutes and vegetables, with some of our own species mixt among them, when the moral hath so required. But besides this kind of Fable, there is another in which the Actors are Passions, Virtues, Vices, and other imaginary persons of the like nature. Some of the ancient Critics will have it, that the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer are Fables of this nature, and that the Vol. I. III.
several names of gods and heroes are nothing else but the affections of the mind in a visible shape and character. Thus they tell us, that Achilles, in the first Iliad, represents Anger, or the irascible part of human nature. That upon drawing his sword against his Superior in a full assembly, Pallas is only another name for Reason, which checks and advises him upon that occasion; and at her first appearance touches him upon the head, that part of the man being looked upon as the seat of Reason. And thus of the rest of the poem. As for the Odyssey, I think it is plain that Horace considered it as one of those allegorical Fables, by the Moral which he has given us of several parts of it. The greatest Italian Wits have applied themselves to the writing of this latter kind of Fables; As Spenser's Fairy-Queen is one continued series of them from the beginning to the end of that admirable work. If we look into the finest Prose-authors of antiquity, such as Cicero, Plato, Xenophon, and many others, we shall find that this was likewise their favourite kind of Fable. I shall only further observe upon it, that the first of this sort that made any considerable figure in the world, was that of Hercules meeting with Pleasure and Virtue; which was invented by Proclus, who lived before Socrates, and in the first dawning of philosophy. He used to travel through Greece by virtue of this Fable, which procured him a kind reception in all the market towns, where he never failed telling it as soon as he had gathered an audience about him.

After this short preface, which I have made up of such materials as my memory does at present suggest to me, before I present my Reader with a Fable of this kind, which I design as the entertainment of the present paper, I must in a few words open the occasion of it.

In the account which Plato gives us of the conversation and behaviour of Socrates, the morning he was to die, he tells the following circumstance.

When Socrates his fetters were knocked off (as was usual to be done on the day that the condemned person was to be executed) being seated in the midst of his disciples, and laying one of his legs over the other, in a most unconcerned posture, he began to rub it, where it had been galled by the iron; and whether it was to shew the indifference with which he entertained the thoughts of his approaching death, or (after his usual manner) to take every occasion of philosophizing upon some useful subject, he observed the pleasure of that sensation which now arose in those very parts of his leg, that just before had been so much pained by the fetter. Upon this he reflected on the nature of pleasure and pain in general, general, and how constantly they succeed one another. To this headded, That if a man of a good genius for a Fable, were to represent the nature of pleasure and pain in that way of writing, he would pro-ably join them together after such a manner, that it would be impossible for the one to come into any place without being followed by the other.

It is possible, that if Plato had thought it proper at such a time to describe Socrates launching out into a discourse which was not of a piece with the busines of the day, he would have enlarged upon this hint, and have drawn it out into some beautiful Allegory or Fable.
But since he has not done it, I shall attempt to write one my self in the spirit of that divine Author.

There were two families, which from the beginning of the world were as opposite to each other as Light and Darkness. The one of them lived in Heaven, and the other in Hell. The youngest descendent of the first family was Pleasure, who was the daughter of Happiness, who was the child of Virtue, who was the offspring of the Gods. These, as I said before, had their habitation in Heaven. The youngest of the opposite fa-my was Pain, who was the son of Misery, who was the child of Vice, who was the offspring of the Furies. The habitation of this race of Beings was in Hell.

The middle station of nature between these two opposite extremities was the earth, which was inhabited by creatures of a middle kind, neither so virtuous as the one, nor so vicious as the other, but partaking of the good and bad qualities of these two opposite families. Jupiter considering that this species, commonly called Man, was too virtuous to be miserable, and too vicious to be happy; that he might make a distinction between the Good and the Bad, ordered the two youngest of the above-mentioned families, Pleasure who was the daughter of Happiness, and Pain who was the son of Misery, to meet one another upon this part of nature which lay in the half way between them, having promised to settle it upon both, provided they could agree upon the division of it, so as to have mankind between them.

Pleasure and Pain were no sooner met in their new habitation, but they immediately agreed upon this point, that Pleasure should take possession of the virtuous, and Pain of the vicious part of that species which was given up to them. But upon examining to which of them any individual they met with belonged, they found each of them had a
right to him; for that, contrary to what they had seen in their old streets of residence, there was no person so vicious who had not some Good in him, nor any person so virtuous who had not in him some Evil. The truth of it is, they generally found upon search, that in the most vicious man Pleasure might lay claim to an hundredth part, and that in the most virtuous man Pain might come in for at least two thirds. This they saw would occasion endless disputes between them, unless they could come to some accommodation. To this end there was a marriage proposed between them, and at length concluded; by this means it is that we find Pleasure and Pain are such constant yoke-fellows, and that they either make their visits together, or are never far asunder. If Pain comes into an heart, he is quickly followed by Pleasure; and if Pleasure enters, you may be sure Pain is not far off.

But notwithstanding this marriage was very convenient for the two parties, it did not seem to answer the intention of Jupiter in sending them among mankind. To remedy therefore this inconvenience, it was stipulated between them by article, and confirmed by the consent of each family, that notwithstanding they here possessed the species indifferently; upon the death of every single person, if he was found to have in him a certain proportion of Evil, he should be dispatched into the infernal regions by a passport from Pain, there to dwell with Misery, Vice and the Furies. Or on the contrary, if he had in him a certain proportion of Good, he should be dispatched into heaven by a passport from Pleasure, there to dwell with Happiness, Virtue and the Gods.

No. 184. Monday, October 1.

--- Operæ in longo fas est obrepere somnum. Hor.

WHEN a man has discovered a new vein of humour, it often carries him much further than he expected from it. My correspondents take the hint I give them, and pursue it into Speculations which I never thought of at my first starting it. This has been the fate of my paper on the match of Grinning, which has already produced a second paper on parallel subjects, and brought me the the following letter by the last post. I shall not prelude any thing to it further, than that it is built on matter of fact, and is as follows.

SIR,

"YOU have already obliged the world with a discourse upon Grimning, and have since proceeded to Whistling, from whence you at length came to Yawning; from this, I think, you may make a very natural transition to Sleeping. I therefore recommend to you for the subject of a paper the following Advertisement, which about two months ago was given into every body's hands, and may be seen with some additions in the Daily Courant of August the ninth.

"Nicholas Hart, who slept last year in St. Bartholomew's Hospital, intends to sleep this year at the Cock and Bottle in Little Britain.

"Having since enquired into the matter of fact, I find that the above-mentioned Nicholas Hart is every year seiz'd with a periodical fit of Sleeping, which begins upon the fifth of August, and ends on the eleventh of the same month: That,

"On the first of that month, he grew dull;
"On the second, appeared drowsy;
"On the third, fell a yawning;
"On the fourth, began to nod;
"On the fifth, dropped asleep;
"On the sixth, was heard to snore;
"On the seventh, turned himself in his bed;
"On the eighth, recovered his former posture;
"On the ninth, fell a stretching;
"On the tenth about midnight, awaked;
"On the eleventh in the morning, called for a little small-beer.

"This account I have extracted out of the Journal of this sleeping Worthy, as it has been faithfully kept by a Gentleman of Lincoln's-inn who has undertaken to be his Historiographer. I have sent it to you, not only as it represents the actions of Nicholas Hart, but as it seems a very natural picture of the life of many an honest English Gentleman, whose whole history very often consists of Yawning, Nodding, Stretching, Turning, Sleeping, Drinking, and the like extraordinary particulars. I do not question, Sir, that if you pleased, you could put out an Advertisement not unlike the above-mentioned, of several men of figure; that Mr. John such a one, Gentleman, or Thomas such a one,
"Esquire,
Esquire, who slept in the country last summer, intends to sleep in town this winter. The worst of it is, that the drowsy part of our species is chiefly made up of very honest Gentlemen, who live quietly among their neighbours, without ever disturbing the public peace; they are drowses without sling, I could heartily wish, that several turbulent, restless, ambitious spirits, would for a while change places with these good men, and enter themselves into Nicholas Hart’s fraternity. Could one but lay asleep a few busy heads which I could name, from the first of November next, to the first of May ensuing, I question not but it would very much redound to the quiet of particular persons, as well as to the benefit of the public.

But to return to Nicholas Hart: I believe, Sir, you will think it a very extraordinary circumstance for a man to gain his livelihood by sleeping, and that rest should procure a man sustenance as well as industry; yet so it is that Nicholas got last year enough to support himself for a twelve-month. I am likewise informed that he has this year had a very comfortable nap. The Poets value themselves very much for sleeping on Parnassus, but I never heard they got a great by it: on the contrary our friend Nicholas gets more by sleeping than he could by working, and may be more properly said, than ever Homer was, to have had golden dreams. Juvenal indeed mentions a drowsy husband who raised an ettate by snoring, but then he is represented to have slept what the common people call dog’s sleep; or if his sleep was real, his wife was awake, and about her business: your pen, which loves to moralize upon all subjects, may raise something, methinks, on this circumstance also, and point out to us those sets of men who, instead of growing rich by an honest industry, recommend themselves to the favours of the Great, by making themselves agreeable companions in the participations of luxury and pleasure.

I must further acquaint you, Sir, that one of the most eminent pens in Grub-street is now employed in writing the dream of this miraculous Sleeper, which I hear will be of more than ordinary length, as it must contain all the particulars that are supposed to have passed in his imagination during so long a sleep. He is said to have gone already through three days and three nights of it, and to have comprised in them the most remarkable passages of the four first Empires of the world. If he can keep free from palsy-strokes, his work may be of use; but this much doubt, having been informed by one of his friends and confidents, that he has spoken some things of Nimrod with too great freedom.

I am ever, Sir, &c.
There is nothing in which men more deceive themselves than in what the world calls Zeal. There are so many passions which hide themselves under it, and so many mischiefs arising from it, that some have gone so far as to say it would have been for the benefit of mankind if it had never been reckoned in the catalogue of virtues. It is certain, where it is once laudable and prudential, it is an hundred times criminal and erroneous; nor can it be otherwise, if we consider that it operates with equal violence in all religions, however opposite they may be to one another, and in all the subdivisions of each religion in particular.

We are told by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that the first murder was occasioned by a religious controversy; and if we had the whole history of Zeal from the days of Cain to our own times, we should see it filled with so many scenes of slaughter and bloodshed, as would make a wise man very careful how he suffers himself to be actuated by such a principle, when it only regards matters of opinion and speculation.

I would have every zealous man examine his heart throughly, and, I believe, he will often find, that what he calls a zeal for his religion, is either pride, interest, or ill-nature. A man who differs from another in opinion, sets himself above him in his own judgment, and in several particulars pretends to be the wiser person. This is a great provocation to the proud man, and gives a keen edge to what he calls his Zeal. And that this is the case very often, we may observe from the behaviour of some of the most zealous for orthodoxy, who have often great friendships and intimacies with vicious immoral men, provided they do but agree with them in the same scheme of belief. The reason is, because the vicious believer gives the precedence to the virtuous man, and allows the good christian to be the worthier person, at the same time that he cannot come up to his perfections. This we find exemplified in that trite passage which which we see quoted in almost every system of Ethicks, though upon another occasion:

—— Vide meliora proboque,
    Deteriora sequor ——

Ovid.

On the contrary, it is certain, if our Zeal were true and genuine, we should be much more angry with a sinner than a heretic; since there are several cases which may excuse the latter before his great judge, but none which can excuse the former.

Interest is likewise a great inflamer, and sets a man on persecution under the colour of Zeal. For this reason we find none are so forward to promote the true worship by fire and sword, as those who find their present account in it. But I shall extend the word Interest to a larger meaning than what is generally given it, as it relates to our spiritual safety and welfare, as well as to our temporal. A man is glad to gain numbers on his side, as they serve to strengthen him in his private opinions. Every proselyte is like a new argument for the establishment of his faith. It makes him believe that his principles carry conviction with them; and are the more likely to be true, when he finds they are conformable to the reason of others, as well as his own. And that this temper of mind deludes a man very often into an opinion of his Zeal, may appear from the common behaviour of the Atheist, who maintains and spreads his opinions with as much heat as those who believe they do it only out of a passion for God's glory.

Ill-nature is another dreadful imitator of Zeal. Many a good man may have a natural rancour and malice in his heart, which has been in some measure quelled and subdued by religion; but if it finds any pretence of breaking out, which does not seem to him inconsistent with the duties of a Christian, it throws off all restraint, and rages in its full fury. Zeal is therefore a great ease to a malicious man, by making him believe he does God service, whilst he is gratifying the bent of a perversive revengeful temper. For this reason we find, that most of the massacres and devastations which have been in the world, have taken their rise from a furious pretended zeal.

I love to see a man zealous in a good matter, and especially when his zeal shews it self for advancing morality, and promoting the happiness of mankind: but when I find the instruments he works with are racks and gibbets, gallies and dungeons; when he imprisons men's persons, confiscates their estates, ruins their families, and burns the body to save the soul, foul, I cannot fick to pronounce of such a one, that (whatever he may think of his faith and religion) his faith is vain, and his religion unprofitable.

After having treated of these false zealots in religion, I cannot forget mentioning a monstrous species of men, who one would not think had any existence in nature, were they not to be met with in ordinary conversation, I mean the zealots in atheism. One would fancy that these men, tho' they fall short in every other respect, of those who make a profession of religion, would at least out-shine them in this particular, and be exempt from that single fault which seems to grow out of the imprudent fervours of religion: but so it is, that infidelity is propagated with as much ferceness and contention, wrath and indignation, as if the safety of mankind depended upon it. There is something so ridiculous and pervers in this kind of zealots, that one does not know how to set them out in their proper colours. They are a sort of gamblers who are eternally upon the fret, though they play for nothing. They are perpetually teasing their friends to come over to them, though at the same time they allow that neither of them shall get any thing by the bargain. In short, the zeal of spreading atheism is, if possible, more absurd than atheism itself.

Since I have mentioned this unaccountable zeal which appears in atheists and infidels, I must further observe that they are likewise in a most particular manner possessed with the spirit of bigotry. They are wedded to opinions full of contradiction and impossibility, and at the same time look upon the smallest difficulty in an article of faith as a sufficient reason for rejecting it. Notions that fall in with the common reason of mankind, that are conformable to the sense of all ages and all nations, not to mention their tendency for promoting the happiness of societies, or of particular persons, are exploded as errors and prejudices; and schemes crept in their head that are altogether monstrous and irrational, and require the most extravagant credulity to embrace them. I would fain ask one of these bigotted infidels, supposing all the great points of atheism, as the casual or eternal formation of the world, the materiality of a thinking substance, the mortality of the soul, the fortuitous organization of the body, the motions and gravitation of matter, with the like particulars, were laid together and formed into a kind of creed, according to the opinions of the most celebrated atheists; I say, supposing such a creed as this were formed, and imposed upon any one people in the world, whether it would not require an infinitely greater measure of faith, than... any set of articles which they so violently oppose. Let me therefore advise this generation of wranglers, for their own and for the public good, to act at least so consistently with themselves, as not to burn with zeal for irreligion, and with bigotry for nonconformity.

Upon my return to my lodgings last night, I found a letter from my worthy friend the Clergyman, whom I have given some account of in my former papers. He tells me in it that he was particularly pleased with the latter part of my yesterday's Speculation; and at the same time enclosed the following Essay, which he desires me to publish as the sequel of that discourse. It consists partly of uncommon reflections, and partly of such as have been already used, but now set in a stronger light.

"A Believer may be excused by the most hardened Atheist for endeavoring to make him a convert, because he does it with an eye to both their interests. The Atheist is inexculpable who tries to gain over a Believer, because he does not propose the doing himself or believer any good by such a conversion.

"The prospect of a future state is the secret comfort and refreshment of my soul; it is that which makes nature look gay about me; it doubles all my pleasures, and supports me under all my afflictions. I can look at disappointments and misfortunes, pain and sickness, death it self, and, what is worse than death, the loss of those who are dearest to me, with indifference, so long as I keep in view the pleasures of eternity, and the state of Being in which there will be no fears nor apprehensions, pains nor sorrows, sickness nor separation. Why will any man be so impertinently officious, as to tell me all this is only fancy and delusion? Is there any merit in being the messenger of ill news? If it is a dream, let me enjoy it, since it makes me both the happier and better man."
"I must confess, I do not know how to trust a man who believes neither heaven nor hell, or in other words, a future state of rewards and punishments. Not only natural self-love, but reason, directs us to promote our own interest above all things. It can never be for the interest of a believer to do me a mischief; because he is sure upon the balance of accounts to find himself a loser by it. On the contrary, if he considers his own welfare in his behaviour towards me, it will lead him to do me all the good he can, and at the same time restrain him from doing me an injury. An unbeliever does not act like a reasonable creature, if he favours me contrary to his present interest, or does not distress me when it turns to his present advantage. Honour and good-nature may indeed tie up his hands; but as these would be very much strengthened by reason and principle, so without them they are only instincts, or wavering unsettled notions, which rest on no foundations. "Infidelity has been attacked with so good success of late years, that it is driven out of all its out-works. The Atheist has not found his post tenable, and is therefore retired into Deism, and a disbelief of revealed religion only. But the truth of it is, the greatest number of this sort of men, are those who, for want of a virtuous education, or examining the grounds of religion, know so very little of the matter in question, that their infidelity is but another term for their ignorance. "As folly and inconsiderateness are the foundations of infidelity, the great pillars and supports of it are either a vanity of appearing wiser than the rest of mankind, or an ostentation of courage in despising the terrors of another world, which have so great an influence on what they call weaker minds; or an aversion to a belief that must cut them off from many of those pleasures they propose to themselves, and fill them with remorse for many of those they have already tasted. "The great received articles of the Christian religion, have been so clearly proved from the authority of that divine revelation in which they are delivered, that it is impossible for those who have ears to hear and eyes to see, not to be convinced of them. But were it possible for any thing in the Christian faith to be erroneous, I can find no ill consequences in adhering to it. The great points of the incarnation and sufferings of our Saviour, produce naturally such habits of virtue in the mind of man, that I say, supposing it were possible for us to be mistaken in them, the Infidel himself must at least allow that no other system of religion could so effectually contribute to the heightening of morality. They give us great ideas of the dignity of humane nature," and of the love which the supræm Being bears to his creatures, and consequently engage us in the highest acts of duty towards our Creator, our neighbour, and our selves. How many noble arguments has Saint Paul railed from the chief articles of our religion, for the advancing of morality in its three great branches? To give a single example in each kind: What can be a stronger motive to a firm trust and reliance on the mercies of our Maker, than the giving us his Son to suffer for us? What can make us love and esteem even the most inconsiderable of mankind, more than the thought that Christ died for him? Or what dispose us to a stricter guard upon the purity of our own hearts, than our being members of Christ, and a part of the Society of which that immaculate person is the head? But these are only a specimen of those admirable enforcements of morality which the Apostle has drawn from the history of our blessed Saviour.

If our modern infidels considered these matters with that candour and sincerity which they deserve, we should not see them act with such a spirit of bitterness, arrogance, and malice: they would not be raising such insignificant cavils, doubts, and scruples, as may be started against every thing that is not capable of mathematical demonstration;
in order to unsettle the minds of the ignorant, disturb the publick peace, subvert morality, and throw all things into confusion and disorder. If none of these reflections can have any influence on them, there is one that perhaps may; because it is adapted to their vanity, by which they seem to be guided much more than by their reason. I would therefore have them consider, that the wisest and best of men in all ages of the world, have been those who lived up to the religion of their country, when they faw nothing in it opposite to morality, and to the best lights they had of the divine nature. Pythagoras’s first rule directs us to worship the Gods as it is ordained by law; for that is the most natural interpretation of the precept. Socrates, who was the most renowned among the heathens both for wisdom and virtue, in his last moments defies his friends to offer a cock to Æsculapius; doubles out of a submissive deference to the established worship of his country.
Xenophon tells us, that his Prince (whom he sets forth as a pattern of perfection) when he found his death approaching, offered sacrifices on the mountains to the Peræan Jupiter, and the Sun, according to the customs of the Persians; for these are the words of the historian. Nay, the Epicureans and atomical philosophers shewed a very remarkable modesty in this particular; for, though the being of a God was entirely repugnant
"repugnant to their schemes of natural philosophy, they contented themselves with the denial of a Providence, affording at the same time the existence of Gods in general; because they would not shock the common belief of mankind, and the religion of their country.

--- Patriæ pietatis imago. Virg.

The following letter being written to my bookseller, upon a subject of which I treated some time since, I shall publish it in this paper, together with the letter that was inclosed in it.

Mr. Buckley,

"Mr. Spectator having of late decanted upon the cruelty of parents to their children, I have been induced (at the request of several of Mr. Spectator's admirers) to inclose this letter, which I assure you is the original from a father to his son, notwithstanding the latter gave but little or no provocation. It would be wonderfully obliging to the world, if Mr. Spectator would give his opinion of it in some of his Speculations, and particularly to

(Mr. Buckley) Your humble Servant.

Sirrah,

"You are a fawcy audacious rascal, and both fool and mad, and I care not a farthing whether you comply or no; that does not raze out my impressions of your insolence, going about railing at me, and the next day to solicit my favour; these are inconsistencies, such as disfigure thy reason depraved. To be brief, I never desire to see your face; and, Sirrah, if you go to the work-house, it is no disgrace to me for you to be supported there; and if you starve in the streets, I'll never give any thing underhand in your behalf. If I have any more of your scribbling nonsense, I will break your head the first time I set sight on you. You are a stubborn beast; is this your gratitude for my giving you money? You Rogue, I'll better your judgment, and give you a greater fentence of your duty to (I regret to say) your father, &c.

"P.S. It is prudence for you to keep out of my flight: for to reproach me, that Might overcomes Right, on the outside of your letter, I shall give you a great knock on the skull for it.

Was there ever such an image of paternal tenderness? It was usual among some of the Greeks to make their slaves drink to excess, and then expose them to their children, who by that means conceived an early aversion to a vice which makes men appear to monstrous and irrational.
I have exposed this picture of an unnatural father with the same intention, that its deformity may deter others from its resemblance. If the Re-der has a mind to see a father of the same stamp represented in the most exquisite strokes of humour, he may meet with it in one of the finest Comedies that ever appeared upon the English stage: I mean the part of Sir Sampson in Love for Love.

I must not however engage my self blindly on the side of the son, to whom the fond letter above-written was directed. His father calls him a saucy and audacious Rascal in the first line, and I am afraid upon examination he will prove but an ungracious youth. To go about raising at his father, and to find no other place but the outside of his letter to tell him that might overcomes right, if it does not discover his reason to be depraved, and that he is either fool or mad, as the choleric old Gentleman tells him, we may at least allow that the father will do very well in endeavouring to better his judgment, and give him a greater sense of his duty. But whether this may be brought about by breaking his head, or giving him a great knock on the skull, ought I think to be well con-considered. Upon the whole, I wish the father has not met with his match, and that he may not be as equally paired with a son, as the mother in Virgil.

—— Cruelis tu quoque mater:

Cruelis mater magis an puer improbus ille?

Improbus ille puer, cruelis tu quoque mater.

Or like the crow and her egg in the Greek proverb,

Κακός κλόκαρας κακίς αὖ.

I must here take notice of a letter which I have received from an unknown correspondent, upon the subject of my paper, upon which the foregoing letter is likewise founded. The writer of it seems very much concerned lest that paper should seem to give encouragement to the dis-
obedience of children towards their parents; but if the writer of it will take the pains to read it over again attentively, I dare say his apprehension will vanish. Pardon and reconciliation are all the penitent daughter requests, and all that I contend for in her behalf; and in this case I may use the saying of an eminent Wit, who upon some great men prizing him to forgive his daughter who had married against his consent, told them he could refuse nothing to their infirmities, but that he would have them remember there was difference between Giving and Forgiving.

I must confess, in all controversies between parents and their children, I am naturally prejudiced in favour of the former. The obligations on that side can never be acquired, and I think it is one of the greatest reflections upon humane nature, that paternal instinct should be a stronger motive to love than filial gratitude; that the receiving of favours should be a less inducement to good-will, tenderness and commiseration, than the conferring of them; and that the taking care of any person should endear the child or dependant more to the parent or benefactor, than the parent or benefactor to the child or dependant; yet so it happens, that for one cruel parent we meet with a thousand undutiful children. This is indeed wonderfully contrived (as I have formerly observed) for the support of every living species; but at the same time that it shews the wisdom of the Creator, it discovers the imperfection and degeneracy of the creature.

The obedience of children to their parents is the basis of all government, and is set forth as the measure of that obedience which we owe to those whom Providence hath placed over us.

It is Father le Comte, if I am not mistaken, who tells us how want of duty in this particular is punished among the Chinefs, inasmuch that if a son should be known to kill or so much as to strike his father, not only the criminal but his whole family would be rooted out, nay the inhabitants of the place where he lived would be put to the sword, nay the place itself would be razed to the ground, and its foundations torn with salt: For, say they, there must have been an utter depravation of manners in that clan or society of people, who could have bred up among them so horrible an offender. To this I shall add a passage out of the first book of Herodotus. That historian in his account of the Persian customs and religion tells us, it is their opinion that no man ever killed his father, or that it is possible such a crime should be in nature; but that if any thing like it should ever happen, they conclude that the reputed son must have been illegitimate, suppositious, or begotten in adultery.
adultery. Their opinion in this particular shews sufficiently what a notion they must have of undutifulness in general.

N° 191. Tuesday, October 9.

SOME judicious Schoolmen have put the case, that if an as were placed between two bundles of hay, which affected his senses equally on each side, and tempted him in the same degree, whether it would be possible for him to eat of either. They generally determine this question to the disadvantage of the as, who they say would starve in the midst of plenty, as not having a single grain of free-will to determine him more to the one than to the other. The bundle of hay on either side striking his sight and smell in the same proportion, would keep him in a perpetual suspense, like the two Magnets which travellers have told us, are placed one of them in the roof, and the other in the floor of Mabonset's burying-place at Monza, and by that means, say they, pull the Impostor's iron collar with such an equal attraction, that it hangs in the air between both of them. As for the as's behaviour in such nice circumstances, whether he would starve sooner than violate his neutrality to the two bundles of hay, I shall not presume to determine; but only take notice of the conduct of our own species in the same perplexity. When a man has a mind to venture his money in a Lottery, every figure of it appears equally alluring, and as likely to succeed as any of its fellows. They all of them have the same pretensions to good luck, stand upon the same foot of competition, and no manner of reason can be given why a man should prefer one to the other before the Lottery is drawn. In this case therefore Caprice very often acts in the place of Reason, and forms to its self some groundless imaginary motive, where real and substantial ones are wanting. I know a well-meaning man that is very well pleased to risk his good fortune upon the number 1711, because it is the year of our Lord. I am acquainted with a Tacker that would give a good deal for the number 134. On the contrary I have been told of of a certain zealous Difent, who being a great enemy to Popery, and believing that bad men are the moft fortunate in this world, will lay two in one on the number 666 against any other number, because, fays he, it is the number of the Beaf. Several would prefer the number 12000 before any other, as it is the number of the pounds in the great prize.
In short, some are pleafed to find their own age in their number; some that they have got a number which makes a pretty appearance in the cyphers; and others, because it is the fame number that fucceeded in the last Lottery. Each of thefe, upon no other grounds, thinks he ftands faireft for the great Lot, and that he is poifed of what may not be improperly called the Golden Number.

These principles of elefion are the paftimes and extravagancies of humman reafon, which is of fo buflie a nature, that it will be exerting it felf in the meanefi trifles, and working even when it wants materials. The wifteft of men are fometimes affected by fuch unaccountable motives, as the life of the fool and the superflitious is guided by nothing elfe.

I am furprized that none of the Fortune-tellers, or, as the French call them, the Difeurs de bonne Aventure, who publish their bills in every quarter of the town, have turned our Lotteries to their advantage; did any of them set up for a Cafer of fortunate figures, what might he not get by his pretended discoveries and predictions.

I remember among the advertisements in the Post-Boy of September the 27th, I was furprized to fee the following one:

This is to give notice, that ten flillings over and above the market price will be given for the Ticket in the 1500001. Lottery, No 132, by Nath. Cliff at the Bible and three Crowns in Cheapside.

This advertisement has given great matter of speculation to Coffeehoufe Theorists. Mr. Cliff's principles and conversation have been can-vafted upon this occasion, and various conjectures made why he shouid thus fet his heart upon No. 132. I have examined all the powers in those numbers, broken them into fractions, extracted the square and cube root, divided and multiplied them all ways, but could not arrive at the Secret till about three days ago, when I received the following Letter from an unknown hand, by which I find that Mr. Nathaniel Cliff is only the Agent, and not the Principal, in this advertisement.
Mr. Spectator,

I am the person that lately advertised I would give ten shillings more than the current price for the Ticket N° 132 in the Lottery now drawing; which is a secret I have communicated to some friends, who rally me incessantly upon that account. You must know I have but one Ticket, for which reason, and a certain dream I have lately had more than once, I was resolved it should be the number I most approved. I am so positive I have pitched upon the great Lot, that I could almost lay all I am worth of it. My visions are so frequent and strong upon this occasion, that I have not only coveted the Lot, but disposed of the money which in all probability it will fetch for. This morning, in particular, I set up an equipage which I look upon to be the gayest in the town; the Liveries are very rich, but not gaudy. I should be very glad to see a Speculation or two upon Lottery subjects, in which you would oblige all people concerned, and in particular

Your most humble Servant, George Golling.

P. S. "Dear Spec, if I get the 12,000 pound, I'll make thee a hand-some Present.

After having wished my correspondent good Luck, and thanked him for his intended kindness, I shall for this time dismiss the subject of the Lottery, and only observe that the greatest part of mankind are in some degree guilty of my friend Golling’s extravagance. We are apt to rely upon future prospects, and become really expensive while we are only rich in possibility. We live up to our expectations, not to our possessions, and make a figure proportionable to what we may be, not what we are. We out-run our present income, as not doubting to disburse our selves out of the profits of some future place, project, or reversion that we have in view. It is through this temper of mind, which is so common among us, that we see Tradesmen break, who have met with no misfortunes in their business, and men of estates reduced to poverty, who have never suffered from losses or repairs, tenants, taxes, or law-suits. In short, it is this foolish sanguine temper, this depending upon contingent Futurities, that occasion romantic generosity, chimical grandeur, senseless ostentation, and generally ends in beggary and ruin. The man who will live above his present circumstances, is in great danger of living in a little time much beneath them, or, as the Italian proverb runs, The man who lives by Hope will die by Hunger.
It should be an indispensible rule in life, to contract our desires to our present condition; and, whatever may be our expectations, to live within the compass of what we actually possess. It will be time enough to enjoy an estate when it comes into our hands; but if we anticipate our good fortune, we shall lose the pleasure of it when it arrives, and may possibly never possess what we have fo foolishly counted upon.

N° 195. Saturday, October 13.

There is a story in the Arabian Nights Tales, of a King who had long languished under an ill habit of body, and had taken abundance of remedies to no purpose. At length, says the fable, a Physician cured him by the following method: he took an hollow ball of wood, and filled it with several drugs; after which he closed it up so artificially that nothing appeared. He likewise took a mall, and after having hollowed the handle, and that part which strikes the ball, he enclosed in them several drugs after the same manner as in the ball itself. He then ordered the Sultan, who was his patient, to exercise himself early in the morning with these rightly prepared instruments, till such time as he should sweat. When, as the story goes, the virtue of the medicaments perspiring through the wood, had so good an influence on the Sultan's constitution, that they cured him of an indisposition which all the compositions he had taken inwardly had not been able to remove. This eastern Alloegy is finely contrived to shew us how beneficial bodily labour is to health, and that Exercise is the most effectual physic. I have described, in my hundred and fifteenth paper, from the general structure and mechanism of an human body, how absolutely necessary Exercise is for its preservation; I shall in this place recommend another great preservative of health, which in many cases produces the same effects as Exercise, and may, in some measure, supply its place, where opportunities of Exercise are wanting. The preservative I am speaking of

of is Temperance, which has those particular advantages above all other means of health, that it may be practised by all ranks and conditions; at any season, or in any place. It is a kind of regimen into which every man may put himself, without interruption to business, expense of money, or loss of time. If Exercise throws off all superfluities, Temperance prevents them; if Exercise clears the vessels, Temperance neither fatigates nor overstrains them; if Exercise raises proper ferments in the humours, and promotes the circulation of the blood, Temperance gives nature her full play, and enables her to exert her self in all her force and vigour; if Exercise dissipates a growing distemper, Temperance starves it.

Phyficke, for the most part, is nothing else but the substitute of Exercise or Temperance. Medicines are indeed absolutely necessary in acute distempers, that cannot wait the slow operations of those two great instruments of health; but did men live in an habitual course of Exercise and Temperance, there would be but little occasion for them. Accordingly we find that those parts of the world are the most healthy, where they subsist by the chase; and that men lived longest when their lives were employed in hunting, and when they had little food besides what they caught. Blistering, cupping, bleeding, are seldom of use but to the idle and intemperate; as all those inward applications which are so much in practice among us, are for the most part nothing else but expedients to make luxury consistent with health. The Apothecary is perpetually employed in counteracting the cook and the vintner. It is said of Diogenes, that meeting a young man who was going to a feast, he took him up in the street and carried him home to his friends, as one who was running into imminent danger, had not he prevented him. What would that Philosopher have said, had he been present at the glutony of a modern meal? Would not he have thought the matter of a family, mad, and have begged his servants to tie down his hands, had he seen him devour fowl, fish and flesh, swallow oil and vinegar, wines and spices; throw down salads of twenty different herbs, sauces, of an hundred ingredients, confections and fruits of numberless sweetnesses and savours? What unnatural motions and counterferments must such a medly of intemperance produce in the body? For my part, when I behold a fashionable table set out in all its magnificence, I fancy that I see gouts and dropsies, fevers and lethargies, with other innumerable distempers lying in ambush in among the dishes.

Nature delights in the most plain and simple diet. Every Animal, but Man, keeps to one dish. Herbs are the food of this species, Fish of that, and and Flesh of a third. Man falls upon every thing that comes in his way, not the smallest fruit or excrescence of the earth, scarce a Berry or a Mushroom can escape him.

It is impossible to lay down any determinate rule for Temperance, because what is Luxury in one may be Temperance in another; but there are few that have lived any time in the world, who are not judges of their own constitutions, so far as to know what kinds and what proportions of food do best agree with them. Were I to consider my Readers as my Patients, and to prefer every such a kind of Temperance as is accommodated to all persons, and such as is particularly suitable to our climate and way of living, I would copy the following rules of a very eminent physician. Make your whole Repast out of one dish. If you indulge in a second, avoid drinking any thing strong till you have finished your Meal; at the same time abstain from all sauces, or at least such as are not the most plain and simple. A man could not well be guilty of gluttony, if he stuck to these few obvious and easy rules. In the first case there would be no variety of tastes to solicit his palate, and occasion excess; nor in the second any artificial provocatives to relieve satiety, and create a false appetite. Were I to prefer a rule for drinking, it should be formed upon a saying quoted by Sir William Temple; the first glass for my self, the second for my friends, the third for good humour, and the fourth for mine enemies. But because it is impossible for one who lives in the world to diet himself always in the most philosophical a manner, I think every man should have his days of abstinence, according as his constitution will permit. These are great reliefs to nature, as they qualify her for struggling with hunger and thirst, whenever any distemper or duty of life may put her upon such difficulties; and at the same time give her an opportunity of extricating herself from her oppressions, and recovering the several tones and springs of her diffused veins. Besides that Abstinence well timed often kills a sickness in embryo, and destroys the first seeds of an indisposition. It is observed by two or three ancient Authors, that Socrates, notwithstanding he lived in Athens during the great plague, which has made so much noise through all ages, and has been celebrated at different times by such eminent hands; I say, notwithstanding that he lived in the time of this devouring pestilence, he never caught the least infection, which those writers unanimously ascribe to that uninterrupted Temperance which he always observed.

And here I cannot but mention an observation which I have often made, upon reading the lives of the Philosophers, and comparing them with
with any series of Kings or great men of the same number. If we consider these ancient fages, a great part of whose Philosophy consisted in a temperate and ablemious course of life, one would think the life of a Philosopher and the life of a man were of two different dates. For we find that the generality of these wise men were nearer an hundred than sixty years of age at the time of their respective deaths. But the most remarkable instance of the efficacy of Temperance towards the procuring of long life, is what we meet with in a little book published by Lewis Corano the Venetian; which I rather mention, because it is of undoubted credit, as the late Venetian Ambassador, who was of the same family, attested more than once in conversation, when he resided in England. Corano, who was the Author of the little treatise I am mentioning, was of an infirm constitution, till about forty, when by obstinately persisting in an exact course of Temperance, he recovered a perfect state of health; insomuch that at fourscore he published his book, which has been translated into English under the title of Sure and certain methods of attaining a long and healthy life. He lived to give a 3d or 4th Edition of it, and after having passed his hundredth year, died without pain or agony, and like one who falls asleep. The treatise I mention has been taken notice of by several eminent Authors, and is written with such a spirit of cheerfulness, religion, and good sense, as are the natural concomitants of temperance and sobriety. The mixture of the old man in it is rather a recommendation than a discredit to it.

Having designed this paper as the sequel to that upon Exercise, I have not here considered Temperance as it is a moral virtue, which I shall make the subject of a future Speculation, but only as it is the means of health.
HERE is a species of women, whom I shall distinguish by the name of Salamanders. Now a Salamander is a kind of Heroine in chastity, that treads upon fire, and lives in the midst of flames without being hurt. A Salamander knows no distinction of Sex in those she converses with, grows familiar with a Stranger at first sight, and is not so narrow-spirited as to observe whether the person she talks to, be in breeches or in petticoats. She admits a male visitant to her bed-side, plays with him a whole afternoon at Pickette, walks with him two or three hours by Moon-light; and is extremely scandalized at the unreasonable excess of an husband, or the severity of a parent, that would debar the sex from such innocent liberties. Your Salamander is therefore a perpetual declaimer against Jealousy, an admirer of the French good-breeding, and a great flickler for freedom in conversation. In short, the Salamander lives in an invincible state of simplicity and innocence: her constitution is preferred in a kind of natural frosst: she wonders what people mean by Temptations, and defies mankind to do their worst. Her chastity is engaged in a constant Ordeal, or fiery trial: (like good Queen Emma) the pretty innocent walks blindfold among burning Plow-hares, without being torched or finged by them.

It is not therefore for the use of the Salamander, whether in a married or single state of life, that I design the following paper; but for such Females only as are made of flesh and blood, and find themselves subject to humane frailties.

As for this part of the fair Sex who are not of the salamander kind, I would most earnestly advise them to observe a quite different conduct in their behaviour; and to avoid as much as possible what religion calls Tempt-Temptations, and the world Opportunities. Did they but know how many thousands of their sex have been gradually betrayed from innocent freedoms to ruin and infamy; and how many millions of ours have begun with flattery, protestations, and endearments, but ended with reproaches, perjury, and perfidiousness: they would shun like death the very first approaches of one that might lead them into inextricable labyrinths of guilt and misery. I must so far give up the cause of the Male world, as to exhort the Female sex in the language of Chamont in the Orphan,

Trust not a man, we are by nature false,
Dishonoring, subtle, cruel, and unconstant:
When a man talks of love, with caution trust him;
But if he swears, he'll certainly deceive thee.

I might very much enlarge upon this subject, but shall conclude it with a story which I lately heard from one of our Spanish Officers, and which may shew the danger a woman incurs by too great familiarities with a Male companion.

An inhabitant of the kingdom of Castile, being a man of more than ordinary prudence, and of a grave composured behaviour, determined about the fiftieth year of his age to enter upon wedlock. In order to make himself easy in it, he cast his eye upon a young woman who had nothing to recommend her but her beauty and her education, her parents having been reduced to great poverty by the wars, which for some years have laid that whole country waste. The Castilian having made his addresses to her and married her, they lived together in perfect happiness for some time; when at length the husband's affairs made it necessary for him to take a voyage to the kingdom of Naples, where a great part of his estate lay. The wife loved him too tenderly to be left behind him. They had not been a shipboard above a day, when they unluckily fell into the hands of an Algerine Pirate, who carried the whole company on shore, and made them slaves. The Castilian and his wife had the comfort to be under the same Master; who seeing how dearly they loved one another, and glistened after their liberty, demanded a most exorbitant price for their ransom. The Castilian, though he would rather have died in slavery himself than have paid such a sum as he found would go near to ruin him, was so moved with compassion towards his wife, that he sent repeated orders to his friend in Spain, (who happened to be his next Relation) to sell his estate, and transmit the money to him. His friend, hoping that the terms of his ransom might be made more reasonable, and unwilling to sell an estate which he himself had some prospect of inheriting, formed so many delays, that three whole years palled away without any thing being done for the setting of them at liberty.

There happened to live a French Renegado in the same place where the Castilian and his wife were kept prisoners. As this fellow had in him all the vivacity of his nation, he often entertained the captives with accounts of his own adventures; to which he sometimes added a song or a dance, or some other piece of mirth, to divert them during their confinement. His acquaintance with the manners of the Algerines enabled him likewise to do them several good offices. The Castilian, as he was one day in conversation with this Renegado, discovered to him the negligence and treachery of his correspondent in Castile, and at the same time asked his advice how he should behave himself in that exigency: he further told the Renegado, that he found it would be impossible for him to raise the money, unless he himself might go over to dispose of his estate. The Renegado, after having represented to him that his Algerine Matter would never consent to his release upon such a pretence, at length contrived a method for the Castilian to make his escape in the habit of a Seaman. The Castilian succeeded in his attempt; and having sold his estate, being afraid lest the money should miscarry by the way, and determining to perish with it rather than lose what was much dearer to him than his life, he returned himself in a little Vessel that was going to Algiers. It is impossible to describe the joy he felt upon this occasion, when he considered that he should soon see the wife whom he so much loved, and endear himself more to her by this uncommon piece of generosity.

The Renegado, during the husband's absence, so insinuated himself into the graces of his young wife, and so turned her head with stories of gallantry, that she quickly thought him the finest Gentleman she had ever conversed with. To be brief, her mind was quite alienated from the honest Castilian, whom she was taught to look upon as a formal old fellow unworthy the possession of so charming a creature. She had been instructed by the Renegado how to manage herself upon his arrival; so that she received him with an appearance of the utmost love and gratitude, and at length persuaded him to trust their common friend the Renegado with the money he had brought over for their Ransom; as not questioning but he would beat down the terms of it, and negociate the affair more to their advantage than they themselves could do. The good man admired her prudence, and followed her advice. I wish I could conceal the sequel of this story, but since I cannot, I shall dispatch it in a few few words as possible. The Castilian having slept longer than ordinary the next morning, upon his awakning found his wife had left him: he immediately rose and enquired after her, but was told that she was seen with the Renegado about break of day. In a word, her Lover having got all things ready for their departure, they soon made their escape out of the territories of Algiers, carried away the money, and left the Castilan in captivity; who partly through the cruel treatment of the Infected Algérie his Master, and partly through the unkind usage of his unfaithful wife, died some few months after.

N° 201. Saturday, October 20.

Religentem esse oportet, Religiosum nefas.
Incerti Authoris apud Aul. Gell.

It is of the last importance to teach the passions of a child with Devotion, which seldom dies in a mind that has received an early tincture of it. Though it may seem extinguished for a while by the cares of the world, the heats of youth, or the allurements of vice, it generally breaks out and discovers itself again as soon as discretion, consideration, age, or misfortunes have brought the man to himself. The fire may be covered and overlaid, but cannot be entirely quenched and smothered.
A state of temperance, sobriety, and justice, without devotion, is a cold, lifeless, insipid condition of virtue; and is rather to be styled Philosophy than Religion. Devotion opens the mind to great conceptions, and fills it with more sublime ideas than any that are to be met with in the most exalted science; and at the same time warms and agitates the soul more than sensual pleasure.

It has been observed by some writers, that Man is more distinguished from the Animal world by Devotion than by Reason, as several brute cretures discover in their actions something like a faint glimmering of Reason, though they betray in no single circumstance of their behaviour any thing that bears the least affinity to Devotion. It is certain, the propensity of the mind to religious worship, the natural tendency of the soul to fly to some
some superior Being for succour in dangers and distresses; the gratitude to an invisible Superintendent which rises in us upon receiving any extraordinary and unexpected good fortune, the acts of love and admiration with which the thoughts of men are so wonderfully transported in meditating upon the Divine Perfections, and the universal concurrence of all the nations under heaven in the great article of Adoration, plainly shew that devotion or religious-worship must be the effect of a tradition from some first Founder of mankind, or that it is conformable to the natural light of Reason, or that it proceeds from an Instinct implanted in the soul itself. For my part, I look upon all these to be the concurrent causes, but which ever of them shall be assigned as the principle of Divine worship, it manifestly points to a Supreme Being as the first Author of it.

I may take some other opportunity of considering those particular forms and methods of devotion which are taught us by Christianity; but shall here observe into what errors even this divine principle may sometimes lead us, when it is not moderated by that right reason which was given us as the guide of all our actions.

The two great errors into which a mistaken devotion may betray us, are Enthusiasm and Superstition.

There is not a more melancholy object than a man who has his head turned with religious Enthusiasm. A person that is crazed, though with pride or malice, is a sight very mortifying to human nature; but when the diisemper arises from any indigester fervours of devotion, or too intense an application of the mind to its mistaken duties, it deforms our companion in a more particular manner. We may however learn this lesson from it, that since Devotion itself (which one would be apt to think could not be too warm) may disorder the mind, unless its heats are tempered with caution and prudence, we should be particularly careful to keep our reason as cool as possible, and to guard our selves in all parts of life against the influence of passion, imagination, and constitution.

Devotion, when it does not lie under the check of reason, is very apt to degenerate into Enthusiasm. When the mind finds her self very much inflamed with her devotions, she is too much inclined to think they are not of her own kindling, but blown up by something Divine within her. If she indulges this thought too far, and assumes the divine passion, she at last flings her self into imaginary raptures and ecstasies; and when once she fancies her self under the influence of a divine impulse, it is no wonder if she flies human ordinances, and refuses to comply with any established form of religion, as thinking her self directed by a much superior Guide.
As Enthusiasm is a kind of excess in devotion, Superstition is the excess not only of devotion, but of religion in general; according to an old heathen saying, quoted by Aulus Gellius, Religiose esse oportet, Religiosum nefas: A man should be religious, not superstitious: for as that Author tells us, Nigidius observed upon this passage, that the Latin words which terminate in ofas generally imply vitious characters, and the having of any quality to an excess.

An Enthusiast in religion is like an obstinate Clown, a Superstitious man like an insipid Courtier. Enthusiasm has something in it of madness, Superstition of folly. Most of the Sects that fall short of the Church of England, have in them strong tinctures of Enthusiasm, as the Roman Catholick Religion is one huge over-grown body of childish and idle Superstitions.

The Roman Catholick Church seems indeed irrecoverably lost in this particular. If an absurd drees or behaviour be introduced in the world, it will soon be found out and discarded: on the contrary, a Habit or Ceremony, though never so ridiculous, which has taken sanctuary in the Church, sticks in it for ever. A Gothic Bishop, perhaps, thought it proper to repeat such a form in such particular shoes or slippers; another fancied it would be very decent if such a part of publick devotions were performed with a Mitre on his head, and a Crozier in his hand: to this a brother Vandal, as wise as the others, adds an antick drees, which he conceived would allude very aptly to such and such Mysteries, till by degrees the whole office has degenerated into an empty show.

Their successors see the vanity and inconvenience of these ceremonies; but instead of reforming, perhaps add others which they think more significant, and which take possession in the same manner, and are never to be driven out after they have been once admitted. I have seen the Pope officiate at St. Peter's, where, for two hours together, he was busied in putting on or off his different accoutrements, according to the different parts he was to act in them.

Nothing is so glorious in the eyes of mankind, and ornamental to humane nature, setting aside the infinite advantages which arise from it, as a strong steady masculine piety; but Enthusiasm and Superstition are the weaknesses of human reason, that expose us to the scorn and derision of Infidels, and sink us even below the Beasts that perish.

Idolatry may be looked upon as another error arising from mistaken devotion; but because reflections on that subject would be of no use to an English Reader, I shall not enlarge upon it.

---Phæbe pater, si das hujus mihi nominis usum,
Nec fallax Clymene culpam sub imagine celat;
Pinguor do, genitor---

Ov. Mer.

There is a loose tribe of men whom I have not yet taken notice of, that ramble into all the corners of this great city, in order to seduce such unfortunate females as fall into their walks. These abandoned profligates raise up issue in every quarter of the town, and very often, for a valuable consideration, father it upon the Churchwarden. By this means there are several married men who have a little family in most of the parishes of London and Westminster, and several bachelors who are undone by a charge of children.

When a man once gives himself this liberty of preying at large, and living upon the common, he finds so much game in a populous city, that it is surprising to consider the numbers which he sometimes propagates. We see many a young fellow who is scarce of age, that could lay his claim to the jus trium liberorum, or the privileges which were granted by the Roman laws to all such as were fathers of three children: nay, I have heard a rake who was not quite five and twenty declare himself the father of a seventh son, and very prudently determine to breed him up a Physician. In short, the town is full of those young Patriots, not to mention several battered Beaus, who, like heedless spendthrifts that squander away their estates before they are masters of them, have raised up their whole flock of children before marriage.

I must not here omit the particular whim of an impudent libertine that had a little flattering of Heraldry; and observing how the Genealogies of great families were often drawn up in the shape of trees, had taken a fancy to dispose of his own illegitimate issue in a figure of the same kind.
— Nec longum tempus, et ingenii

Exit ad caelum ramis feliciorum

Miraturque novas frondes, et non sua poma.

Virg.

The trunk of the tree was marked with his own name, Will. Maple. Out of the side of it grew a large barren branch, inscribed Mary Maple, the name of his unhappy wife. The head was adorned with five huge boughs. On the bottom of the first was written in capital letters Kate Cole, who branched out into three sprigs, viz. William, Richard, and Rebecca. Sal Towiford gave birth to another bough that shot up into Sarah, Tom, Will, and Frank. The third arm of the tree had only a single infant in it, with a space left for a second, the parent from whom it sprang being near her time when the Author took this ingenious device into his head. The two other great boughs were very plentifully loaded with fruit of the same kind; besides which, there were many ornamental branches that did not bear. In short, a more flourishing tree never came out of the Herald's office.

What makes this generation of vermin so very prolific, is the indefatigable diligence with which they apply themselves to their business. A man does not undergo more watchings and fatigues in a campaign, than in the course of a vicious amour. As it is said of some men, that they make their business their pleasure, these sons of darkness may be said to make their pleasure their business. They might conquer their corrupt inclinations with half the pains they are at in gratifying them.

Nor is the invention of these men less to be admired than their industry and vigilance. There is a fragment of Apollodorus the comic Poet (who was contemporary with Menander) which is full of humour, as follows: Thou mayst shut up thy doors, says he, with bars and bolts: It will be impossible for the blacksmith to make them so fast, but a cat and a whoremaster will find a way through them. In a word, there is no head so full of stratagem as that of a libidinous man.

Were I to propose a punishment for this infamous race of propagators, it should be to send them, after the second or third offence, into our American Colonies, in order to people those parts of her Majesty's dominions where there is a want of inhabitants, and in the phrase of Diogenes, to plant men. Some countries punish this crime with death; but I think such a punishment would be sufficient, and might turn this generative faculty to the advantage of the publick.
In the mean time, till these Gentlemen may be thus disposed of, I would earnestly exhort them to take care of those unfortunate creatures whom they have brought into the world by these indirect methods, and to give their spurious children such an education as may render them more virtuous than their parents. This is the best atonement they can make for their own crimes, and indeed the only method that is left them to repair their past miscarriages.

I would likewise desire them to consider, whether they are not bound in common humanity, as well as by all the obligations of religion and nature, to make some provision for those whom they have not only given life to, but entailed upon them, though very unreasonably, a degree of shame and disgrace. And here I cannot but take notice of those depraved notions which prevail among us, and which must have taken rise from our natural inclination to favour a vice to which we are so very prone, namely, that Bastardy and Cuckoldom should be looked upon as reproaches, and that the shame which is only due to lewdness and selfishness, should fall in an unreasonable manner upon the persons who are innocent.

I have been insensibly drawn into this discourse by the following letter, which is drawn up with such a spirit of sincerity, that I question not but the writer of it has represented his case in a true genuine light.

Sir,

I am one of those people who by the general opinion of the world are counted both infamous and unhappy.

My father is a very eminent man in this kingdom, and one who bears considerable offices in it. I am his son, but my misfortune is, that I dare not call him father, nor be without shame own me as his issue. I am illegitimate, and therefore deprived of that endearing tenderness and unparallelled satisfaction which a good man finds in the love and conversation of a parent: neither have I the opportunities to render him the duties of a son, he having always carried himself at so vast a distance, and with such superiority towards me, that by long use I have contracted a timorousness when before him, which hinders me from declaring my own necessities, and giving him to understand the inconveniences I undergo.

It is my misfortune to have been neither bred a scholar, a soldier, nor to any kind of business, which renders me entirely incapable of making provision for myself without his assistance; and this creates a continual tinual uneasiness in my mind, fearing I shall in time want bread; my father, if I may so call him, giving me but very faint assurances of doing any thing for me.
I have hitherto lived somewhat like a gentleman, and it would be very hard for me to labour for my living. I am in continual anxiety for my future fortune, and under a great unhappiness in losing the sweet conversation and friendly advice of my parents; so that I cannot look upon my self otherwise than as a monster strangely sprung up in nature, which every one is ashamed to own.
I am thought to be a man of some natural parts, and by the continual reading what you have offered the world, become an admirer thereof, which has drawn me to make this confession; at the same time hoping, if any thing herein shall touch you with a sense of pity, you would then allow me the favour of your opinion thereupon; as also what part I, being unlawfully born, may claim of the man's affection who begot me, and how far in your opinion I am to be thought his son, or he acknowledged as my father. Your sentiments and advice herein will be a great consolation and satisfaction to,

SIR, Your Admirer and Humble Servant, W. B.

Decipimus speciei recti——— Hor.

When I meet with any vicious character that is not generally known, in order to prevent its doing mischief, I draw it at length, and set it up as a scare-crow: by which means I do not only make an example of the person to whom it belongs, but give warning to all her Majesty's subjects, that they may not suffer by it. Thus, to change the allusion, I have marked out several of the shoals and quicklands of life, and am continually employed in discovering those which are still concealed, in order to keep the ignorant and unwary from running upon them. It is with this intention that I publish the following letter, which brings to light some secrets of this nature.

Mr. SPECTATOR,

"THERE are none of your Speculations which I read over with a greater delight, than those which are designed for the improvement of our sex. You have endeavoured to correct our unreasonable fears and superstitions, in your seventh and twelfth papers; our fancy for equipage, in your fifteenth; our love of puppet shows, in your thirty first; our notions of beauty, in your thirty third; our inclination for romances, in your thirty seventh; our passion for French topperies, in your forty fifth; our manhood and party-zeal, in your fifty seventh; our abuse of dancing, in your sixty sixth and sixty seventh; our levity, in your hundred and twenty eighth; our love of coxcombs, in your hundred and fifty fourth, and hundred and fifty seventh; our tyranny over the henpecked, in your hundred and seventy sixth. You have described the Thief in your forty first; the Idol, in your seventy third; the Demurrer, in your eighty ninth; the Salamander, in your hundred and ninety eighth. You have likewise taken to pieces our dreéis, and represented to us the extravagances we are often guilty of in that particular. You have fallen upon our patches, in your fiftieth and eighty first; our commodes, in your ninety eighth; our fans in your hundred and second; our riding habits, in your hundred and fourth; our hoop-petticoats, in your hundred and twenty seventh; besides a great many little blemishes, which you have touched upon in your several other papers, and in those many letters that are scattered up and down your works. At the same time we must own, that the compliments you pay our sex are innumerable, and that those very faults which you represent in us, are neither black in themselves, nor, as you own, universal among us. But, Sir, it is plain that these your discourses are calculated for none but the fashionable part of womankind, and for the use of those who are rather indiscreet than vicious. But, Sir, there is a sort of prostitutes in the lower part of our sex, who are a scandal to us, and very well deserve to fall under your censure. I know it would debate your paper too much to enter into the behaviour of these female libertines; but as your remarks on some part of it would be a doing of justice to several women of virtue and honour, whose reputations suffer by it, I hope you will not think it improper to give the publick some accounts of this nature. You must know, Vol. III. Z. " know, know, Sir, I am provoked to write you this letter by the behaviour of an infamous woman, who having wasted her youth in a most shameless state of prostitution, is now one of those who gain their livelihood by seducing others, that are younger than themselves, and by establishing a criminal commerce between the two sexes. Among several of her artifices to get money, she frequently persuades a vain young fellow, that such a woman of quality, or such a celebrated toad, entertains a secret passion for him, and wants nothing but an opportunity of revealing it: nay, she has gone so far as to write letters in the name of a woman of figure, to borrow money of one of these foolish Rodrigo's, which she has afterwards appropriated to her own use. In the mean time, the person who has lent the money, has thought a Lady under obligations to him, who scarce knew his name; and wondered at her ingratitude when she has been with her, that she has not owned the favour, though at the same time she was too much a man of honour to put her in mind of it.

When this abandoned baggage meets with a man who has vanity enough to give credit to relations of this nature, she turns him to a very good account, by repeating praises that were never uttered, and delivering messages that were never sent. As the house of this shameless creature is frequented by several foreigners, I have heard of another artifice, out of which she often raises money. The foreigner sights after some Britishe beauty, whom he only knows by name; upon which she promises, if he can be secret, to procure him a meeting. The stranger, ravished at his good fortune, gives her a present, and in a little time is introduced to some imaginary title; for you must know that this cunning purveyor has her representatives, upon this occasion, of some of the finest Ladies in the kingdom. By this means, as I am informed, it is usual enough to meet with a German Count in foreign countries, that shall make his boasts of favours he has received from women of the highest ranks, and the most unblemished characters.

Now, Sir, what safety is there for a woman's reputation, when a Lady may be thus prostituted as it were by proxy, and be reputed an unchaste woman; as the Hero in the ninth book of Dryden's Virgil is looked upon as a coward, because the phantom which appeared in his likeness ran away from Turnus? You may depend upon what I relate to you to be matter of fact, and the practice of more than one of these female panders. If you print this letter, I may give you some further accounts of this vicious race of women.

Your humble Servant, Belvidera.
I shall add two other letters on different subjects to fill up my paper.

Mr. Spectator,

"I am a country clergyman, and hope you will lend me your assistance, in ridiculing some little indecencies which cannot so properly be exposed from the pulpit.

"A widow Lady, who straggled this summer from London into my parish for the benefit of the air, as she says, appears every Sunday at Church with many fashionable extravagancies, to the great astonishment of my congregation.

"But what gives us the most offence is her theatrical manner of singing the psalms. She introduces above fifty Italian airs into the hundredth psalm, and whilst we begin All People in the old solemn tune of our fore-fathers, the in a quite different key runs divisions on the vowels, and adorns them with the graces of Nicolini; if she meets with eke or aye, which are frequent in the metre of Hopkins and Sternhold, we are certain to hear her quavering them half a minute after us to some sprightly airs of the opera.

"I am very far from being an enemy to church music; but fear this abuse of it may make my parish ridiculous, who already look on the singing psalms as an entertainment, and not part of their devotion.

"Besides, I am apprehensive that the infection may spread, for Squire Squeakum, who by his voice seems (if I may use the expression) to be cut out for an Italian singer, was last Sunday practising the same airs.

"I know the Lady's principles, and that she will plead the toleration which (as she fancies) allows her non-conformity in this particular; but I beg you to acquaint her, that singing the psalms in a different tune from the rest of the congregation, is a sort of schism not tolerated by that act.

I am, SIR,
Your very humble Servant, R. S.

Mr. Spectator,

"In your paper upon Temperance, you prescribe to us a rule for drinking, out of Sir William Temple, in the following words: the first glass for my self, the second for my friends, the third for good humour, and the fourth for mine enemies. Now, Sir, you must know that I have read this your Spectator in a club whereof I am a member; when our President told us there was certainly an error in the print, and that the word Glass should be Bottle; and therefore has ordered me to inform you of this mistake, and to desir[e] you to publish the following errata: In the paper of Saturday, October 13, Col. 3, Line 11, for Glass read Bottle.

Omnibus in terris, quae sunt à Gadibus usque Auroram et Gangem, pauci dignoscere possint Vera bona, atque illis multum diversa, remotà
Erroris nebulâ——

Juv.

In my last Saturday's paper I laid down some thoughts upon Devotion in general, and shall here shew what were the notions of the most refined heathens on this subject, as they are represented in Plato's dialogue upon prayer, entitled, Alcibiades the Second, which doubtless gave occasion to Juvenal's tenth Satyr, and to the second Satyr of Persius; as the last of these Authors has almost transcribed the preceding dialogue, entitled, Alcibiades the First, in his fourth Satyr.

The Speakers in this dialogue upon prayer, are Socrates and Alcibiades; and the substance of it (when drawn together out of the intricacies and digressions) as follows.

Socrates meeting his Pupil Alcibiades, as he was going to his devotions, and observing his eyes to be fixed upon the earth with great seriousness and attention, tells him, that he had reason to be thoughtful on that occasion, since it was possible for a man to bring down evils upon himself by his own prayers, and that those things which the gods send him, in answer to his petitions might turn to his destruction: this, says he, may not only happen when a man prays for what he knows is mischievous in its own nature, as Oedipus implored the gods to losw diffusion between his lions; but when he prays for what he believes would be for his good, and against what he believes would be to his detriment. This the Philosopher...
lo soph o e th y s s u d i t e d t o happen among us, since most men are blind ed with ignorance, prejudice, or passion, which hinder them from seeing such things as are really beneficial to them. For an instance, he asks Alcibiades, Whether he would not be thoroughly pleased if that God to whom he was going to address himself, should promise to make him the Sover eign of the whole earth? Alcibiades answers, That he should dou bles look upon such a promise as the greatest favour that could be bestowed up on him. Socrates then asks him, If after receiving this great favour he would be content to lose his life? or if he would receive it though he was sure he would make an ill use of it? To both which questions Alcibiades answers in the negative. Socrates then shews him from the examples of others, how these might very probably be the effects of such a blessing. He then adds, that other reputed pieces of good fortune, as that of having a son, or procuring the highest post in a government, are subject to the like fatal consequences; which nevertheless, says he, men ardently desire, and would not fail to pray for, if they thought their prayers might be effectual for the obtaining of them.

Having established this great point, That all the most apparent blessings in this life are obnoxious to such dreadful consequences, and that no man knows what in its events would prove to him a blessing or a curse, he teaches Alcibiades after what manner he ought to pray.

In the first place, he recommends to him, as the Model of his devotion, a short prayer, which a Greek Poet composed for the use of his friends, in the following words: O Jupiter, give us those things which are good for us, whether they are such things as we pray for, or such things as we do not pray for; and remove from us those things which are hurtful, though they are such things as we pray for.

In the second place, that his Disciple may ask such things as are expedient for him, he shews him, that it is absolutely necessary to apply himself to the study of true wisdom, and to the knowledge of that which is his chief good, and the most suitable to the excellency of his nature.

In the third and last place he informs him, that the best methods he could make use of to draw down blessings upon himself, and to render his prayers acceptable, would be to live in a constant practice of his duty towards the gods, and towards men. Under this head he very much recommends a form of prayer the Lacedemonians made use of, in which they petition the gods, to give them all good things, so long as they are virtuous. Under this head likewise he gives a very remarkable account of an Oracle to the following purpose.

When
When the Athenians in the war with the Lacedemonians received many defeats both by sea and land, they sent a message to the Oracle of Jupiter Ammon, to ask the reason why they had erected so many temples to the gods, and adorned them with such costly offerings; why they had instituted so many festivals, and accompanied them with such pomp and ceremonies; in short, why they had vainly set up so many hecatombs at their Altars, should be less successful than the Lacedemonians, who fell short of them in all these particulars. To this, says he, the Oracle made the following reply: I am better pleased with the prayer of the Lacedemonians, than with all the oblations of the Greeks. As this prayer implied and encouraged virtue in those who made it; the Philosopher proceeds to shew how the most vicious man might be devout, so far as victims could make him, but that his offerings were regarded by the gods as bribes, and his petitions as blasphemies. He likewise quotes on this occasion two verses out of Homer, in which the Poet says, that the scent of the Trojan sacrifices was carried up to heaven by the winds; but that it was not acceptable to the gods, who were displeased with Priam and all his people.

The conclusion of this dialogue is very remarkable. Socrates having deterred Alcibiades from the prayers and sacrifices which he was going to offer, by setting forth the above-mentioned difficulties of performing that duty as he ought, adds these words, We must therefore wait till such time as we may learn how to behave ourselves towards the gods, and towards men. But when will that time come, says Alcibiades, and who is it that will instruct us? for I would fain see this man, whoever he is. It is one, says Socrates, who takes care of you; but as Homer tells us, that Minerva removed the Milf from Diomedes his eyes, that he might plainly discover both gods and men: to the darkness that hangs upon your mind must be removed, before you are able to discern what is good and what is evil. Let him remove from my mind, says Alcibiades, the darkness, and what else he pleases; I am determined to refuse nothing he shall order me, whoever he is, so that I may become the better man by it. The remaining part of this dialogue is very obscure: there is something in it that would make us think Socrates hinted at himself, when he spoke of this divine teacher who was to come into the world, did not he own that he himself was in this respect as much as a lout, and in as great distress as the rest of mankind.

Some learned men look upon this conclusion as a prediction of our Saviour, or at least that Socrates, like the High-priest, prophesied unknowingly.
ingly, and pointed at that divine teacher who was to come into the world some ages after him. However that may be, we find that this great Philosopher saw, by the light of reason, that it was suitable to the goodness of the divine nature, to send a person into the world, who should instruct mankind in the duties of religion, and, in particular, teach them how to pray.

Whoever reads this abstract of Plato’s discourse on prayer, will, I believe, naturally make this reflection. That the great Founder of our religion, as well by his own example, as in the form of prayer which he taught his Disciples, did not only keep up to those rules which the light of nature had suggested to this great Philosopher, but instructed his Disciples in the whole extent of this duty, as well as of all others. He directed them to the proper object of adoration, and taught them, according to the third rule above-mentioned, to apply themselves to him in their closets, without show or ostentation, and to worship him in Spirit and in Truth. As the Lacedemonians in their form of prayer implored the Gods in general to give them all good things; so long as they were virtuous, we ask in particular that our offences may be forgiven, as we forgive those of others. If we look into the second rule which Socrates has prescribed, namely, That we should apply our selves to the knowledge of such things as are best for us, this too is explained at large in the doctrines of the Gospel, where we are taught in several instances to regard those things as curials, which appear as blessings in the eye of the world; and on the contrary, to esteem those things as blessings, which to the generality of mankind appear as curials. Thus in the form which is prescribed to us, we only pray for that happiness which is our chief good, and the great end of our existence, when we petition the supreme Being for the coming of his kingdom, being solicitous for no other temporal blessing but our daily sustenance. On the other side, we pray against nothing but sin, and against evil in general, leaving it with omnipotence to determine what is really such. If we look into the first of Socrates’s rules of Prayer, in which he recommends the above-mentioned form of the ancient Poet, we find that Form not only comprehended, but very much improved in the petition, wherein we pray to the supreme Being that his Will may be done: which is of the same force, with that Form which our Saviour used, when he prayed against the most painful and most ignominious of deaths, Nevertheless not my will, but thine be done. This comprehensive petition is the most humble, as well as the most prudent, that can be offered up from the creature to his Creator, as it fulfills poses the supreme Being wills nothing but what is for our good, and that he knows better than our selves what is so.

γεναλιάς ἔδε γενέσσα ἄνθρωπον
Ἠρμίδες ἀρσενοῦ, ἢδε βίος κακὸς.

Simonides.

THERE are no Authors I am more pleased with, than those who shew humane nature in a variety of views, and describe the several ages of the world in their different manners. A Reader cannot be more rationally entertained, than by comparing the virtues and vices of his own times, with those which prevailed in the times of his fore-fathers; and drawing a parallel in his mind between his own private character, and that of other persons, whether of his own age, or of the ages that went before him. The contemplation of mankind under these changeable colours, is apt to frame us out of any particular vice, or animate us to any particular virtue; to make us pleased or displeased with our selves in the most proper points, to clear our minds of prejudice and prepossession, and rectify that narrowness of temper which inclines us to think amiss of those who differ from our selves.

If we look into the manners of the most remote ages of the world, we discover humane nature in her simplicity; and the more we come downward towards our own times, may observe her hiding her self in artifices and refinements, polished insensibly out of her original plainness, and at length entirely lost under form and ceremony, and (what we call) good breeding. Read the accounts of men and women as they are given us by the most ancient writers, both sacred and profane, and you would think you were reading the history of another species.

Among the writers of antiquity, there are none who instruct us more openly in the manners of their respective times in which they lived, than those who have employed themselves in fayrs, under what dressoever it may appear; as there are no other Authors whose province it is to enter ter so directly into the ways of men, and set their miscarriages in so strong a light.

Simonides, a Poet famous in his generation, is I think Author of the oldest Satyr that is now extant; and, as some say, of the first that was ever written. This Poet flourished about four hundred years after the siege of Troy; and shews, by his way of writing, the simplicity, or rather coarseness, of the age in which he lived. I have taken notice, in my hundred and sixty first Speculation, that the rule of observing what the French call the Bienfaisance, in an allusion, has been found out of latter years; and that the ancients, provided there was a likeness in their similitudes, did not much trouble themselves about the decency of the comparison. The Satyrs or Lambicks of Simonides, with which I shall entertain my Readers in the present paper, are a remarkable instance of what I formerly advanced. The subject of this Satyr is Woman. He describes the sex in their several characters, which he derives to them from a fanciful supposition raised upon the doctrine of Pre-existence. He tells us, That the Gods formed the Souls of women out of those seeds and principles which compose several kinds of animals and elements; and that their good or bad dispositions arise in them according as such and such seeds and principles predominate in their constitutions. I have translated the Author very faithfully, and if not word for word (which our language would not bear) at least so as to comprehend every one of his sentiments, without adding any thing of my own. I have already apologized for this Author's want of delicacy, and must further premise, That the following Satyr affects only some of the lower part of the sex, and not those who have been refined by a polite education, which was not so common in the age of this Poet.

In the beginning God made the Souls of womankind out of different materials, and in a separate state from their bodies.

The Souls of one kind of women were formed out of those ingredients which compose a Swine. A woman of this make is a slut in her house, and a glutton at her table. She is uncleanly in her person, a flatterer in her dress, and her family is no better than a dunghill.

A second sort of female Soul was formed out of the same materials that enter into the composition of a Fox. Such an one is what we call a notable discerning woman, who has an insight into every thing, whether it be good or bad. In this species of females there are some virtuous and some vicious.
A third kind of women were made up of Canine particles. These are what we commonly call Scolds, who imitate the animals out of which they were taken, that are always busy and barking, that quarrel at every one who comes in their way, and live in perpetual clamour.

The fourth kind of women were made out of the earth. These are your sluggards, who pass away their time in indolence and ignorance, however the fire a whole winter, and apply themselves with alacrity to no kind of business but eating.

The fifth species of females were made out of the sea. These are women of variable temper, sometimes all storm and tempest, sometimes all calm and sunshine. The stranger who sees one of these in her smiles and smoothness, would cry her up for a miracle of good humour; but on a sudden her looks and words are changed, she is nothing but fury and outrage, noise and hurricane.

The sixth species were made up of the ingredients which compose an afe, or a beast of burden. These are naturally exceeding slothful, but upon the husband's exerting his authority, will live upon hard fare, and do every thing to please him. They are however far from being adverse to Venereal pleasure, and seldom refuse a male companion.

The cat furnished materials for a seventh species of women, who are of a melancholy, sordid, unamiable nature, and so repugnant to the offers of love, that they fly in the face of their husband when he approaches them with conjugal endeavours. This species of women are likewise subject to little thefts, cheat, and pilferings.

The Mare, with a flowing mane, which was never broke to any servile toil and labour, composed an eighth species of women. These are they who have little regard for their husbands, who pass away their time in dressing, basking, and perfuming; who throw their head into the nicest curls, and trick it up, with the fairest flowers and garlands. A woman of this species is a very pretty thing for a stranger to look upon, but very detrimental to the owner, unless it be a King or Prince who takes a fancy to such a toy.

The ninth species of females were taken out of the Ape. These are such as are both ugly and ill-natured, who have nothing beautiful in themselves, and endeavour to detract from or ridicule every thing which appears so in others.

The tenth and last species of women were made out of the Bee; and happy is the man who gets such an one for his wife. She is altogether faultless and unblameable; her family flourishes and improves by her good good management. She loves her husband, and is beloved by him. She brings him a race of beautiful and virtuous children. She distinguishes her sex among her sex. She is surrounded with graces. She never sits among the base tribe of women, nor passes away her time with them in wanton discourse. She is full of virtue and prudence, and is the best wife that Jupiter can bestow on man.

I shall conclude these pamphlets with the motto of this paper, which is a fragment of the same Author: A man cannot possess any thing that is better than a good woman, nor any thing that is worse than a bad one.

As the Poet has shown a great penetration in this diversity of female characters, he has avoided the fault which Juvenal and Moncier Boileau are guilty of, the former in his sixth, and the other in his fifth Satyr, where they have endeavoured to expose the sex in general, without doing justice to the valuable part of it. Such levelling Satyrs are of no use to the world, and for this reason I have often wondered how the French Author above-mentioned, who was a man of exquisite judgment, and a lover of virtue, could think humane nature a proper subject for Satyr in another of his celebrated pieces, which is called The Satyr upon Man. What vice or frailty can a discourse correct, which censure the whole species alike, and endeavours to shew by some superficial strokes of wit, that brutes are the more excellent creatures of the two? A Satyr should expose nothing but what is corrigible, and make a due discrimination between those who are, and those who are not the proper objects of it.

HAVING lately translated the fragment of an old Poet, which describes womankind under several characters, and supposes them to have drawn their different manners and dispositions from those animals and elements out of which he tells us they were compounded; I had some thoughts of giving the sex their revenge, by laying together... in another paper the many vicious characters which prevail in the male world, and shewing the different ingredients that go to the making up of such different humours and confictions. Horace has a thought which is something akin to this, when, in order to excuse himself to his Mistrs, for an invective which he had written against her, and to account for that unreasonable fury with which the heart of man is often transported, he tells us, that when Prometheus made his man of clay, in the kneading up of the heart he sealed it with some furious particles of the Lion.
But upon turning this plan to and fro in my thoughts, I observed so many unaccountable humours in man, that I did not know out of what animals to fetch them. Male souls are diversify'd with so many characters, that the world has not variety of materials sufficient to furnish out their different tempers and inclinations. The creation, with all its animals and elements, would not be large enough to supply their several extravag-gances.

Indeed therefore of pursuing the thought of Simonides, I shall observe that as he has expos'd the vicious part of women from the doctrine of Preexistence, some of the ancient Philosophers have, in a manner, fatized the vicious part of the human species in general, from a notion of the soul's Preexistence, if I may so call it; and that as Simonides performs brutes entering into the composition of women, others have represented humane souls as entering into brutes. This is commonly termed the doctrine of Transmigration, which supposes that humane souls, upon their leaving the body, become the souls of such kinds of brutes as they most resemble in their manners; or to give an account of it, as Mr.
Dryden has described it in his translation of Plato as his speech in the fifteenth book of Ovid, where that Philosopher dissuades his hearers from eating flesh.

*Thus all things are but alter'd, nothing dies,"
*And here and there th'unbody'd spirit flies;"
*By time, or force, or sickness dispos'd;"
*And lodges where it lights in bird or beast;"
*Or hunts without till ready limbs it find;"
*And attenuates these according to their kind;"
*From tenement to tenement it roves;"
*The soul is still the same, the figure only lost;"
*Then let not piety be put to flight,"
*To please the taste of glutton-appetite;"

But
But suffer innate souls secure to dwell,
Leach from their seats your parents you expel;
With rabid hunger feed upon your kind,
Or from a beast dislodge a brother's mind.

Plato in his vision of Eras the Armenian, which I may possibly make the subject of a future speculation, records some beautiful transmigrations;
as that the soul of Orpheus, who was musical, melancholy, and a womanhater, entered into a Swan; the soul of Ajax, which was all wrath and fierceness, into a Lion; the soul of Agamemnon, that was rapacious and imperial, into an Eagle; and the soul of Theseus, who was a mimick and a buffoon, into a Monkey.

Mr. Congreve, in a Prologue to one of his Comedies, has touched upon this doctrine with great humour.

Thus Aristotle's soul, of old that was,
May now be damn'd to animate an ass;
Or in this very house, for ought we know,
Is doing painful penance in some Beau.

I shall fill up this paper with some Letters which my last Tuesday's Spec-culation has produced. My following correspondents will shew, what I there observed, that the Speculation of that day affects only the lower part of the sex.

From my house in the Strand, October 30, 1711.

Mr. Spectator,

"Upon reading your Tuesday's paper, I find by several symptoms in my constitution, that I am a Bee. My shop, or if you please to call it so, my Cell, is in that great Hive of females which goes by the name of the New-Exchange; where I am daily employed in gathering together a little Stock of gain from the finest flowers about the town, I mean the Ladies and the Beaus. I have a numerous swarm of children, to whom I give the best education I am able: but, Sir, it is my misfortune to be married to a Drone, who lives upon what I get without bringing any thing into the common stock. Now, Sir, as on the one hand I take care not to behave my self towards him like a Wasp, likewise I would not have him look upon me as a Humble Bee; for which reason I do all I can to put him upon laying up provisions for a bad day, and frequently represent to him the fatal effects his sloth and negli-negligence may bring upon us in our old age. I must beg that you will join with me in your good advice upon this occasion, and you will for ever oblige

Your humble Servant, MELISSA.

S I R,

Piccadilly, October 31, 1711.

I am joined in wedlock for my sins to one of the Fillies who are described in the old Poet with that hard name you gave us the other day. She has a flowing mane, and a skin as soft as silk: but,
Sir, she spares half her life at her gaits, and almost ruins me in ribbons.
For my own part, I am a plain handicraft man, and in danger of breaking by her lazines & expensiveness. Pray, Master, tell me in your next paper, whether I may not expect of her so much drudgery as to take care of her family, and curry her hide in cafe of refusal.

Your loving friend, Barnaby Brittle.

Mr. Spectator,

Cheapside, October 30.

I am mightly pleased with the humour of the Cat, be it kind as to enlarge upon that subject.

Yours till death, Josiah Henpeck.

P. S. "You must know I am married to a Grumakin.

S I R,

Wapping, October 31, 1711.

Ever since your Spectator of Tuesday last came into our family, my husband is pleased to call me his Ocean, because the foolish old Poet that you have translated says, That the souls of some women are made of sea-water. This, it seems, has encouraged my sauce-box to be witty upon me. When I am angry, he cries, Pr'ythee my dear be calmer; when I chide one of my servants, pr'ythee child do not blesser.
He had the impudence about an hour ago to tell me, that he was a seafaring man, and must expect to divide his life between Storm and Sunshine. When I bestray myself with any spirit in my family, it is high sea in his house; and when I sit still without doing anything, his affairs fortooth are wind-bound. When I ask him whether it rains, he makes answer, it is no matter, so that it be fair weather within doors.
In short, Sir, I cannot speak my mind freely to him, but I either scowl or rage, or do something that is not fit for a civil woman to hear.
Pray Mr. Spectator, since you are so sharp upon other women, let us know what materials your wife is made of, if you have one. I hap-

It is the great art and secret of Christianity, if I may use that phrase, to manage our actions to the best advantage, and direct them in such a manner, that every thing we do may turn to account at that great day, when every thing we have done will be set before us.

In order to give this consideration its full weight, we may cast all our actions under the division of such as are in themselves either good, evil, or indifferent. If we divide our intentions after the same manner, and consider them with regard to our actions, we may discover that great art and secret of religion which I have here mentioned.

A good intention joined to a good action, gives it its proper force and efficacy; joined to an evil action, extenuates its malignity, and in some cases may take it wholly away; and joined to an indifferent action, turns it to virtue, and makes it meritorious as far as humane actions can be so.

In the next place, to consider in the same manner the influence of an evil intention upon our actions. An evil intention perverts the best of actions, and makes them in reality what the fathers with a witty kind of zeal have termed the virtues of the heathen world, so many sinning in.

It destroys the innocence of an indifferent action, and gives an evil action all possible blackness and horror, or in the emphatical language of sacred Writ, makes sin exceeding sinful.

If, in the last place, we consider the nature of an indifferent intention, we shall find that it destroys the merit of a good action; abates, but never takes away, the malignity of an evil action; and leaves an indifferent action in its natural state of indifference.
It is therefore of unspeakable advantage to possess our minds with an habitual good intention, and to aim all our thoughts, words and actions at some laudable end, whether it be the glory of our Maker, the good of mankind, or the benefit of our own souls.

This is a sort of thrift or good-husbandry in moral life, which does not throw away any single action, but makes every one go as far as it can. It multiplies the means of Salvation, encreases the number of our virtues, and diminishes that of our vices.

There is something very devout, though not so solid, in Acosta's answer to Limborch, who objects to him the multiplicity of ceremonies in the Jewish religion, as washings, dressings, meats, purifications, and the like. The reply with the Jew makes upon this occasion, is, to the best of my remembrance, as follows: "There are not duties enough (says he) in the essential parts of the law for a zealous and active obedience. Time, place, and person are requisite, before you have an opportunity of putting a moral virtue into practice. We have therefore, says he, enlarged the sphere of our duty, and made many things which are in themselves in different a part of our religion, that we may have more occasion of shewing our love to God, and in all the circumstances of life be doing something to please him."

Monseur St. Evremont has endeavoured to palliate the superflities of the Roman-catholic religion with the same kind of apology, where he pretends to consider the different spirit of the Papists and the Calvinists, as to the great points wherein they disagree. He tells us, that the former are actuated by love, and the other by fear; and that in their expressions of duty and devotion towards the supreme Being, the former seem particularly careful to do every thing which may possibly please him, and the other to abstain from every thing that may possibly displease him.

But notwithstanding this plausible reason with which both the Jew and the Roman-catholic would excuse their respective superflities, it is certain there is something in them very pernicious to mankind, and destructive to religion; because the injunction of superfluous ceremonies makes such actions duties, as were before indifferent, and by that means renders religion more burdensome and difficult than it is in its own nature, betrays many into sins of omission which they would not otherwise be guilty of, and fixes the minds of the vulgar to the shadowy unessential points, instead of the more weighty and more important matters of the law.
This zealous and active obedience however takes place in the great point we are recommending; for if, instead of prescribing to our selves indifferent actions as duties, we apply a good intention to all our most indifferent actions, we make our very existence one continued act of obedience, we turn our diversions and amusements to our eternal advantage, and are pleasing him (whom we are made to please) in all the circumstances and occurrences of life.

It is this excellent frame of mind, this holy officiousness (if I may be allowed to call it such) which is recommended to us by the Apostle in that uncommon precept, wherein he directs us to propose to our selves the glory of our Creator in all our most indifferent actions, whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do.

A person therefore who is possessed with such an habitual good intention, as that which I have been here speaking of, enters upon no single circumstance of life, without considering it as well pleasing to the great Author of his Being, conformable to the dictates of reason, suitable to human nature in general, or to the particular station in which Providence has placed him. He lives in a perpetual sense of the divine presence, regards himself as acting, in the whole course of his existence, under the observation and inspection of that Being, who is privy to all his motions and all his thoughts, who knows his down-falling and his uprising, who is about his path, and about his bed, and spateth out all his ways. In a word, he remembers that the eye of his Judge is always upon him, and in every action he reflects that he is doing what is commanded or allowed by Him who will hereafter either reward or punish it. This was the character of those holy men of old, who in that beautiful phrase of scripture are said to have walked with God.

When I employ my self upon a paper of morality, I generally consider how I may recommend the particular virtue which I treat of, by the precepts or examples of the ancient heathens; by that means, if possible, to influence those who have greater advantages of knowing their duty, and therefore greater obligations to perform it, into a better course of life: besides that, many among us are unreasonably disposed to give a fairer hearing to a pagan philosopher, than to a christian writer.

I shall therefore produce an instance of this excellent frame of mind in a speech of Socrates, which is quoted by Erasmus. This great Philosopher on the day of his execution, a little before the draught of poison was brought to him, entertaining his friends with a discourse on the immortality of the Soul, has these words: Whether or no God will approve of my actions, I know not; but this I am sure of, that I have at all times made it my endeavour to please him, and I have a good hope that this my endeavour will be accepted by him. We find in these words of that great man the habitual good intention which I would here inculcate, and with which that divine Philosopher always acted. I shall only add, that Erasmius, who was an unbegoted Roman Catholick, was so much transported with this passage of Socrates, that he could scarce forbear looking upon him as a Saint, and desiring him to pray for him; or as that ingenious and learned writer has expressed himself in a much more lively manner, When I reflect on such a speech pronounced by such a person, I can scarce forbear crying out, Sancte Socrates, ora pro nobis. O holy Socrates, pray for us.

Ingenua didisse fideliter artes
Emolliit mores, nec finit esse feros.

Or.

Consider an humane Soul without education like marble in the quarry, which shews none of its inherent beauties, till the skill of the polisher fetches out the colours, makes the surface shine, and discovers every ornamental cloud, spot and vein that runs through the body of it. Education, after the same manner, when it works upon a noble mind, draws out to view every latent virtue and perfection, which without such helps are never able to make their appearance.

If my Reader will give me leave to change the allusion so soon upon him, I shall make use of the same instance to illustrate the force of education, which Aristotle has brought to explain his doctrine of substancial forms, when he tells us that a statue lies hid in a block of marble; and that the art of the statuary only clears away the superfluous matter, and removes the rubbish. The figure is in the stone, the Sculptor only finds it. What Sculpture is to a block of marble, Education is to an humane Soul. The Philosopher, the Saint, or the Hero, the wife, the good, or the
the great man, very often lie hid and concealed in a Plebeian, which a proper education might have dis-interred, and have brought to light. I am therefore much delighted with reading the accounts of savage nations; and with contemplating those virtues which are wild and uncultivated; to see courage exerting itself in fierceness, resolution in obli gency, wisdom in cunning, patience in fullness and despair.

Mens passions operate variably, and appear in different kinds of actions, according as they are more or less rectified and sway'd by reason. When one hears of Negroes, who upon the death of their masters, or upon changing their service, hang themselves upon the next tree, as it frequently happens in our American plantations, who can forbear admiring their fidelity, though it express'd it felt in so dreadful a manner? What might not that savage greatness of soul which appears in these poor wretches on many occasions, be rais'd to, were it rightly cultivated? and what colour of excuse can there be for the contempt with which we treat this part of our species; that we should not put them upon the common foot of humanity; that we should only set an insignificant fine upon the man who murders them; nay, that we should, as much as in us lies, cut them off from the prospect of happiness in another world as well as in this, and deny them that which we look upon as the proper means for attaining it?

Since I am engaged on this subject, I cannot forbear mentioning a story which I have lately heard, and which is so well attested, that I have no manner of reason to suspect the truth of it. I may call it a kind of wild tragedy that pass'd about twelve years ago at St. Christophers, one of our British Leeward Islands. The Negroes who were concern'd in it, were all of them the slaves of a gentleman who is now in England.

This gentleman among his negroes had a young woman, who was look'd upon as a most extraordinary beauty by those of her own complexion. He had at the same time two young fellows, who were likewise negroes and slaves, remarkable for the comeliness of their persons; and for the friendship which they bore to one another. It unfortunately happen'd that both of them fell in love with the female negro above mention'd, who would have been very glad to have taken either of them for her husband, provided they could agree between themselves which should be the man. But they were both so passionately in love with her, that neither of them could think of giving her up to his rival; and at the same time were so true to one another, that neither of them would think of gaining her without his friend's consent. The troubles of these two lovers lovers were the discourse of the family to which they belonged, who could not forbear observing the strange complication of passions which perplexed the hearts of the poor negroes, that often dropp'd expressions of the uneasiness they underwent, and how impossible it was for either of them ever to be happy.

After a long struggle between love and friendship, truth and jealousy, they one day took a walk together into a wood, carrying their mistress along with them; where, after abundance of lamentations, they stabbed her to the heart, of which she immediately died. A slave, who was at his work not far from the place where this astonishing piece of cruelty was committed, hearing the shrieks of the dying person, ran to see what was the occasion of them. He there discovered the woman lying dead upon the ground, with the two negroes on each side of her, kissing the dead corps, weeping over it, and beating their breasts in the utmost agonies of grief and despair. He immediately ran to the English family with the news of what he had seen; who, upon coming to the place saw the woman dead, and the two negroes expiring by her with wounds they had given themselves.

We see, in this amazing instance of barbarity, what strange disorders are bred in the minds of those men whose passions are not regulated by virtue, and disciplined by reason. Though the action which I have recited is in itself full of guilt and horror, it proceeded from a temper of mind which might have produced very noble fruits, had it been informed and guided by a suitable education.

It is therefore an unspeakable blessing to be born in those parts of the world where wisdom and knowledge flourish; though it must be confessed, there are, even in those parts, several poor uninstructed persons, who are but little above the inhabitants of those nations of which I have been here speaking; as those who have had the advantages of a more liberal education, rise above one another by several different degrees of perfection. For to return to our statue in the block of marble, we see it sometimes only begun to be chipped, sometimes rough-hewn, and but just sketched into an human figure; sometimes we see the man appearing distinctly in all his limbs and features, sometimes we find the figure wrought up to a great elegance, but seldom meet with any to which the hand of a Phidias or a Praxiteles could not give several nice touchings and finishing.

Discourses of morality, and reflections upon human nature, are the best means we can make use of to improve our minds, and gain a true knowledge ledge of our selves, and consequently to recover our souls out of the vice of ignorance, and prejudice which naturally cleave to them. I have all along professed myself in this paper a promoter of these great ends, and I flatter myself that I do from day to day contribute something to the polishing of men's minds; at least my design is laudable, whatever the execution may be. I must confess I am not a little encouraged in it by many letters which I receive from unknown hands, in approbation of my endeavours; and must take this opportunity of returning my thanks to those who write them, and excusing myself for not inserting several of them in my papers, which I am sensible would be a very great ornament to them. Should I publish the praises which are so well penned, they would do honour to the persons who write them, but my publishing of them would I fear be a sufficient instance to the world, that I did not deserve them.

N° 219. Saturday, November 10.

Vix ea nostra voco——

Ov.

There are but few men who are not ambitious of distinguishing themselves in the nation or country where they live, and of growing considerable among those with whom they converse. There is a kind of grandeur and respect, which the meanest and most insignificant part of mankind endeavour to procure in the little circle of their friends and acquaintance. The poorest mechanic, nay, the man who lives upon common alms, gets him his set of admirers, and delights in that superiority which he enjoys over those who are in some respects beneath him. This ambition, which is natural to the soul of man, might methinks receive a very happy turn; and, if it were rightly directed, contribute as much to a person's advantage, as it generally does to his uneasiness and disquiet.

I shall therefore put together some thoughts on this subject, which I have not met with in other writers; and shall set them down as they have occurred to me, without being at the pains to connect or methodize them.
All superiority and preeminence that one man can have over another, may be reduced to the notion of Quality, which, considered at large, is either that of fortune, body, or mind. The first is that which consists in birth, title, or riches; and is the most foreign to our natures, and what we can call our own of any of the three kinds of Quality. In relation to the body, Quality arises from health, strength, or beauty; which are nearer to us, and more a part of our selves than the former. Quality, as it regards the mind, has its rise from knowledge or virtue; and is that which is more essential to us, and more intimately united with us than either of the other two.

The Quality of fortune, though a man has left reason to value himself upon it than on that of the body or mind, is however the kind of Quality which makes the most shining figure in the eye of the world.

As Virtue is the most reasonable and genuine source of honour, we generally find in titles an intimation of some particular merit that should recommend men to the high stations which they possess. Holines is ascribed to the Pope; Majesty to Kings; Serenity or mildness of temper to Princes; Excellence or perfection to Ambassadors; Grace to Archbishops; Honour to Peers; Worship or venerable behaviour to Magistrates; Reverence, which is of the same import as the former, to the inferior Clergy.

In the Founders of great families, such attributes of honour are generally correspondent with the virtues of that person to whom they are applied; but in the descendants they are too often the marks rather of Grandeur than of Merit. The stamp and denomination still continues, but the intrinsic value is frequently lost.

The death-bed shews the emptiness of titles in a true light. A poor dispirited sinner lies trembling under the apprehensions of the state he is entering on; and is asked by a grave attendant how his Holiness does? Another hears himself addressed to under the title of Highness or Excellency, who lies under such mean circumstances of mortality as are the disgrace of humane nature. Titles at such a time look rather like insults and mockery than respect.

The truth of it is, honours are in this world under no regulation; true Quality is neglected, Virtue is oppressed, and Vice triumphant. The last day will rectify this disorder, and assign to every one a station suitable to the dignity of his character; Ranks will be then adjusted, and Precedency set right.

Methinks
Methinks we should have an ambition, if not to advance ourselves in another world, at least to preserve our Post in it, and outshine our inferiors in virtue here, that they may not be put above us in a state which is to settle the distinction for eternity.

Men in Scripture are called Strangers and Sojourners upon earth, and life a Pilgrimage. Several heathen, as well as Christian Authors, under the same kind of metaphor, have represented the world as an Inn, which was only designed to furnish us with accommodations in this our passage. It is therefore very absurd to think of setting up our Rest before we come to our journey's end, and not rather to take care of the reception we shall there meet with, than to fix our thoughts on the little conveniences and advantages which we enjoy one above another in the way to it.

Epicurus makes use of another kind of allusion, which is very beautiful, and wonderfully proper to incline us to be satisfied with the post in which Providence has placed us. We are here, says he, as in a Theatre, where every one has a part allotted to him. The great duty which lies upon a man is, to act his part in perfection. We may indeed say, that our part does not suit us, and that we could act another better. But this (says the Philosopher) is not our business. All that we are concerned in is, to excell in the part which is given us. If it be an improper one, the fault is not in us, but in him who has cast our several parts, and is the great disposer of the Drama.

The part which was acted by this Philosopher himself was but a very indifferent one, for he lived and died a slave. His motive to contentment in this particular receives a very great reinforcement from the above-mentioned consideration, if we remember that our parts in the other world will be now cast, and that mankind will be there ranged in different stations of superiority and preeminence, in proportion as they have here excelled one another in virtue, and performed in their several posts of life the duties which belong to them.

There are many beautiful passages in the little Apocryphal book, entitled, The Wisdom of Solomon, to set forth the vanity of honour; and the like temporal blessings, which are in so great repute among men, and to comfort those who have not the possession of them. It represents in very warm and noble terms this advancement of a good man in the other world, and the great surprize which it will produce among those who are his superiors in this. "Then shall the righteous man stand in great boldness, "before the face of such as have afflicted him, and made no account of his. his labours. When they see it, they shall be troubled with terrible fear, and shall be amazed at the strangeness of his salvation, so far beyond all that they looked for. And they repenting and groaning for anguish of spirit, shall say within themselves; This was he whom we had some time in derision, and a proverb of reproach. We fools accounted his life madness, and his end to be without honour. How is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the Saints! If the Reader would see the description of a life that is past away in vanity, and among the shadows of pomp and greatness, he may see it very finely drawn in the same place. In the mean time, since it is necessary in the present constitution of things, that order and distinction should be kept up in the world, we should be happy, if those who enjoy the upper stations in it, would endeavour to surpaś others in virtue, as much as in rank, and by their humanity and condescension make their superiority easy and acceptable to those who are beneath them; and if, on the contrary, those who are in the meaner posts of life, would consider how they may better their condition hereafter, and by a just deference and submission to their superiors, make them happy in those blessings with which Providence has thought fit to distinguish them.

N° 221. Tuesday, November 13.

---- Ab ovo
Usque ad malam---- Hor.

WHEN I have finished any of my Speculations, it is my method to consider which of the ancient Authors have touched upon the subject that I treat of. By this means I meet with some celebrated thought upon it, or a thought of my own expressed in better words, or some similitude for the illustration of my subject. This is what gives birth to the motto of a Speculation, which I rather choose to take out of the Poets than the Prose-writers, as the former generally give a finer turn to a thought than the latter, and by couching it in a few words, and in harmonious numbers, make it more portable to the memory.
My Reader is therefore sure to meet with at least one good line in every paper, and very often finds his imagination entertained by a hint that awakens in his memory some beautiful passage of a Classic Author.

It was a saying of an ancient Philosopher, which I find some of our writers have ascribed to Queen Elizabeth, who perhaps might have taken occasion to repeat it, That a good face is a Letter of recommendation. It naturally makes the beholders inquisitive into the person who is the owner of it, and generally prepossesses them in his favour. A handsome motto has the same effect. Besides that, it always gives a supernumerary beauty to a paper, and is sometimes in a manner necessary when the writer is engaged in what may appear a Paradox to vulgar minds, as it shews that he is supported by good authorities, and is not singular in his opinion.

I must confess the Motto is of little use to an unlearned Reader; for which reason I consider it only as a word to the wise. But as for my unlearned friends, if they cannot relish the Motto, I take care to make provision for them in the body of my paper. If they do not understand the sign that is hung out, they know very well by it, that they may meet with entertainment in the house; and I think I was never better pleased than with a plain man's compliment, who upon his friend's telling him that he would like the Spectator much better if he understood the Motto, replied, Good wine needs no bush.

I have heard of a couple of Preachers in a country town, who endeavoured which should out-flite one another, and draw together the greatest congregation. One of them being well versed in the Fathers, used to quote every now and then a Latin sentence to his illiterate hearers, who it seems found themselves so edified by it, that they flocked in greater numbers to this learned man than to his Rival. The other finding his congregation mouldering every Sunday, and hearing at length what was the occasion of it, resolved to give his Parish a little Latin in his turn; but being unacquainted with any of the Fathers, he digested into his Sermons the whole book of Quaerror, adding however such explanations to it as he thought might be for the benefit of his people. He afterwards invited upon As in presentibus, which he converted in the same manner to the use of his parishioners. This in a very short time thickened his audience, filled his Church, and routed his antagonist.

The natural love to Latin, which is so prevalent in our common people, makes me think that my Speculations fare never the worse among them for that little scrap which appears at the head of them; and what the more encourages me in the use of quotations in an unknown tongue, is, that I hear the Ladies, whose approbation I value more than that of the whole learned world, declare themselves in a more particular manner pleased with my Greek Motto's.

Designing this day's work for a dissertation upon the two Extremities of my paper, and having already dispatched my Motto, I shall, in the next place, discourse upon those single capital letters which are placed at the end of it, and which have afforded great matter of speculation to the Curious. I have heard various conjectures upon this subject. Some tell us, that C is the mark of those papers that are written by the Clergyman, though others ascribe them to the Club in general. That the papers marked with R were written by my friend Sir Roger. That L signifies the Lawyer, whom I have described in my second Speculation; and that T stands for the Trader or Merchant: But the letter X, which is placed at the end of some few of my papers, is that which has puzzled the whole town, as they cannot think of any name which begins with that letter, except Xenophon and Xerxes, who can neither of them be supposed to have had any hand in these Speculations.

In answer to these inquisitive Gentlemen, who have many of them made enquiries of me by Letter, I must tell them the reply of an ancient Philosopher, who carried something hidden under his Cloak. A certain acquaintance desiring him to let him know what it was he covered so carefully; I cover it, says he, on purpose that you should not know. I have made use of these obscure marks for the same purpose. They are, perhaps, little Amulets or Charms to preserve the paper against the fascination or malice of evil eyes; for which reason I would not have my Reader surprized, if hereafter he sees any of my papers marked with a Q, a Z, a Y, an &c. or with the word Abracadabra.

I shall however so far explain my self to the Reader, as to let him know that the letters C, L, and X are cabalistical, and carry more in them than it is proper for the world to be acquainted with. Those who are versed in the philosophy of Pythagoras, and swear by the Tetragrammaton, that is, the number Four, will know very well that the number Ten, which is signified by the letter X, and which has so much perplexed the town) has in it many particular powers; that it is called by Platonic writers the Compleat Number; that one, two, three and four put together make up the number Ten; and that Ten is all. But these are not mysteries for ordinary Readers to be let into. A man must have spent many years in hard study before he can arrive at the knowledge of them.
We had a rabbinical Divine in England, who was Chaplain to the Earl of Essex in Queen Elizabeth's time, that had an admirable head for secrets of this nature. Upon his taking the Doctor of Divinity's degree, he preached before the University of Cambridge, upon the first verse of the first chapter of the first book of Chronicles, in which, says he, you will see the three following words.

Adam, Seth, Enoch.

He divided this short text into many parts, and discovering several mysteries in each word, made a most learned and elaborate discourse. The name of this profound Preacher was Doctor Alabaster, of whom the Reader may find a more particular account in Doctor Fuller's book of English Worthies. This instance will, I hope, convince my Readers that there may be a great deal of fine writing in the capital letters which bring up the rear of my paper, and give them some satisfaction in that particular. But as for the full explication of these matters, I must refer them to time, which discourses all things.

No 223. Thursday, November 15.

O sacris animis qualis bonam
Antebac suffus, tales cium sint reliqua! Phard.

WHEN I reflect upon the various fate of those multitudes of ancient writers who flourished in Greece and Italy, I consider Time as an immense ocean, in which many noble Authors are entirely swallowed up, many very much shattered and damaged, some quite disjointed and broken into pieces, while some have wholly escaped the common wreck; but the number of the last is very small.

Apparant rari nauta in surgite vaso.

Among the mutilated Poets of antiquity, there is none whose fragments are so beautiful as those of Sappho. They give us a taste of her way of writing, which is perfectly conformable with that extraordinary character... character we find of her, in the remarks of those great critics who were conversant with her works when they were entire. One may see by what is left of them, that she followed nature in all her thoughts, without descending to those little points, conceits, and turns of wit with which many of our modern Lyricks are so miserably infected. Her Soul seems to have been made up of Love and Poetry: she felt the passion in all its warmth, and described it in all its symptoms. She is called by ancient Authors the Tenth Muse; and by Plutarch is compared to Cacus the son of Vulcan, who breathed out nothing but flame. I do not know by the character that is given of her works, whether it is not for the benefit of mankind that they are lost. They were filled with such bewitching tendernefs and rapture, that it might have been dangerous to have given them a reading.

An inconstant lover, called Phaon, occasioned great calamities to this poetical Lady. She fell desperately in love with him, and took a voyage into Sicily, in pursuit of him, he having withdrawn himself thither on purpose to avoid her. It was in that island, and on this occasion, she is supposed to have made the Hymn to Venus, with a translation of which I shall present my Reader. Her Hymn was ineffectual for the procuring that happiness which she prayed for in it. Phaon was still obdurate, and Sappho transported with the violence of her passion, that she was resolved to get rid of it at any price.

There was a promontory in Acrarnania called Leucate, on the top of which was a little Temple dedicated to Apollo. In this Temple it was usual for despairing Lovers to make their vows in secret, and afterwards to fling themselves from the top of the precipice into the sea, where they were sometimes taken up alive. This place was therefore called The Lover's leap; and whether or no the fright they had been in, or the resolution that could pull them to so dreadful a remedy, or the bruises which they often received in their fall, banished all the tender sentiments of love, and gave their spirits another turn; those who had taken this leap were observed never to relapse into that passion. Sappho tried the cure, but perished in the experiment.

After having given this short account of Sappho so far as it regards the following Ode, I shall join the translation of it as it was sent me by a friend, whose admirable Pastorals and Winter-piece have been already so well received. The Reader will find in it that pathetic simplicity which is so peculiar to him, and so suitable to the Ode he has here translated. This Ode in the Greek (besides those beauties observed by Madam
An HYMN to VENUS.

I.
O Venus, beauty of the skies,
To whom a thousand Temples rise,
Gayly false in gentle smiles,
Full of love perplexing wiles;
O Goddess! from my heart remove
The wasting cares and pains of love.

II.
If ever thou hast kindly heard
A song in soft distress preferr'd,
Propitious to my humble vow,
O gentle Goddess! hear me now.
Defend, thou bright, immortal guest,
In all thy radiant charms confest.

III.
Thou once didst leave Almighty Love,
And all the golden roofs above:
The Carr thy wanton Sparrows drew,
Hovering in air they lightly flew;
As to my bower they wing'd their way:
I saw their quav'ring pinions play.

IV.
The birds dismist (while you remain)
Bore back their empty Carr again:
Then you, with looks divinely mild,
In every heavenly feature mild,
And ask'd, what new complaints I made;
And why I call'd you to my aid?

V. What.
V.
What phrenzy in my bosom raged,
And by what cure to be assuaged?
What gentle youth I would allure,
Whom in my artful toils secure?
Who does thy tender heart subdue,
Tell me, my Sappho, tell me who?

VI.
Tho' now he sheurs thy longing arms,
He soon shall court thy flighted charms;
Tho' now thy Offerings be despise,
He soon to thee shall sacrifice;
Tho' now be freeze, he soon shall burn,
And be thy victim in his turn.

Celestial visitant, once more
Thy needful presence I implore;
In pity come and ease my grief;
Bring my disordered soul relief;
Favour thy suppliants hidden fires,
And give me all my heart desires.

Madam Dacier observes there is something very pretty in that circumstance of this Ode, wherein Venus is describ'd as sending away her chariot upon her arrival at Sappho's lodgings, to denote that it was not a short transient visit which she intended to make her. This Ode was preserved by an eminent Greek critic, who inferred it intire in his works, as a pattern of perfection in the structure of it.

Longinus has quoted another Ode of this great Poetess, which is likewise admirable in its kind, and has been translated by the same hand with the foregoing one. I shall oblige my Reader with it in another paper. In the mean while, I cannot but wonder, that these two finished pieces have never been attempted before by any of our country-men. But the truth of it is, the compositions of the antients, which have not in them any of those unnatural witticisms that are the delight of ordinary Readers, are extremely difficult to render into another tongue, so as the beauties of the original may not appear weak and faded in the translation.

I have often thought if the minds of men were laid open, we should see but little difference between that of the wise man and that of the fool. There are infinite Reveries, numberless extravagances, and a perpetual train of vanities which pass through both. The great difference is, that the first knows how to pick and cull his thoughts for conversation, by suppressing some, and communicating others; whereas the other lets them all indifferently fly out in words. This sort of discretion, however, has no place in private conversation between intimate friends. On such occasions the wisest men very often talk like the weakest; for indeed the talking with a friend is nothing else but thinking aloud.

Tully has therefore very justly expos'd a precept delivered by some ancient writers, that a man should live with his enemy in such a manner as might leave him room to become his friend; and with his friend in such a manner, that if he became his enemy, it should not be in his power to hurt him. The first part of this rule, which regards our behaviour towards an enemy, is indeed very reasonable, as well as very prudential; but the latter part of it, which regards our behaviour towards a friend, favours more of cunning than of discretion, and would cut a man off from the greatest pleasures of life, which are the freedoms of conversation with a bosom friend. Besides that, when a friend is turned into an enemy, and (as the son of Strach calls him) a betrayer of secrets, the world is just enough to accuse the perfidiousness of the friend, rather than the indiscretion of the person who confided in him.

Discretion does not only show itself in words, but in all the circum-fances of action; and is like an under-agent of providence, to guide and direct us in the ordinary concerns of life.

There are many more shining qualities in the mind of man, but there is none so useful as Discretion; it is this indeed which gives a value to all the rest, which sets them at work in their proper times and places, and turns turns them to the advantage of the person who is possessing of them. Without it learning is pedantry, and wit impertinence; Virtue it self looks like weakness; the best parts only qualify a man to be more sprightly in errors, and active to his own prejudice.

Nor does Discretion only make a man the master of his own parts, but of other mens. The discreet man finds out the talents of those he converses with, and knows how to apply them to proper uses. Accordingly if we look into particular communities and divisons of men, we may observe that it is the discreet man, not the witty, nor the learned, nor the brave, who guides the conversation, and gives measures to the society. A man with great talents, but void of discretion, is like Polyphemus in the fable, strong and blind, endued with an irresistible force, which for want of light is of no use to him.

Though a man has all other perfections, and wants Discretion, he will be of no great consequence in the world: but if he has this single talent in perfection, and but a common share of others, he may do what he pleases in his station of life.

At the same time I think Discretion the most useful talent a man can be master of. I look upon Cunning to be the accomplishment of little, mean, ungenerous minds. Discretion points out the noblest ends to us, and pursues the most proper and laudable methods of attaining them: Cunning has only private selfish aims, and sticks at nothing which may make them succeed. Discretion has large and extended views, and, like a well-formed eye, commands a whole horizon: Cunning is a kind of short-sightedness, that discovers the minutest objects which are near at hand, but is not able to discern things at a distance. Discretion the more it is discovered, gives a greater authority to the person who possesses it: Cunning, when it is once detected, loses its force, and makes a man incapable of bringing about even those events which he might have done, had he passed only for a plain man. Discretion is the perfection of reason, and a guide to us in all the duties of life: Cunning is a kind of instinct, that only looks out after our immediate interest and welfare. Discretion is only found in men of strong sense and good understandings: Cunning is often to be met with in brutes themselves, and in persons who are not the fewest removes from them. In short, Cunning is only the mimic of Discretion, and may pass upon weak men in the same manner as vivacity is often mistaken for wit, and gravity for wisdom.

The cast of mind which is natural to a discreet man, makes him look forward into futurity, and consider what will be his condition millions of
of ages hence, as well as what it is at present. He knows that the misery or happiness which are referred for him in another world, lose nothing of their reality by being placed at a great distance from him. The objects do not appear little to him because they are remote. He considers that those pleasures and pains which lie hid in eternity, approach nearer to him every moment, and will be present with him in their full weight and measure, as much as those pains and pleasures which he feels at this very instant. For this reason he is careful to secure to himself that which is the proper happiness of his nature, and the ultimate design of his being. He carries his thoughts to the end of every action, and considers the most distant as well as the most immediate effects of it. He supercedes every little prospect of gain and advantage which offers itself here, if it does not find it consistent with his views of another. In a word, his hopes are full of immortality, his schemes are large and glorious, and his conduct suitable to one who knows his true interest, and how to pursue it by proper methods.

I have, in this essay upon Discretion, considered it both as an accomplishment and as a virtue, and have therefore described it in its full extent; not only as it is convenient about worldly affairs, but as it regards our whole existence; not only as it is the guide of a mortal creature, but as it is in general the director of a reasonable being. It is in this light that Discretion is represented by the wise man, who sometimes mentions it under the name of Discretion, and sometimes under that of Wisdom. It is indeed (as described in the latter part of this paper) the greatest wisdom, but at the same time in the power of every one to attain. Its advantages are infinite, but its acquisition easy; or, to speak of her in the words of the apocryphal writer whom I quoted in my last Saturday's paper, Wisdom is glorious, and never fadeth away, yet she is easily seen of them that love her, and found of such as seek her. She preventeth them that desire her, in making herself known unto them. He that seeketh her early, shall have no great travels: for he shall find her sitting at his doors. To think therefore upon her is perfection of wisdom, and whoso watcheth for her shall quickly be without care. For the goeth about seeking such as are worthy of her, sheweth her self favourably unto them in the ways, and meeteth them in every thought.

Vol. III.  D d  Tuesday,
In my last Thursday's paper I made mention of a place called the Lover's Leap, which I find has raised a great curiosity among several of my correspondents. I there told them that this Leap was used to be taken from a promontory of Leucas. This Leucas was formerly a part of Acarnania, being joined to it by a narrow neck of land, which the sea has by length of time overflowed and washed away; so that at present Leucas is divided from the continent, and is a little Island in the Ionian sea. The promontory of this Island, from whence the lover took his leap, was formerly called Leucase. If the reader has a mind to know both the Island and the promontory by their modern titles, he will find in his map the ancient Island of Leucas under the name of St. Mauro, and the ancient promontory of Leucase under the name of The Cape of St. Mauro.

Since I am engaged thus far in antiquity, I must observe that Theocritus in the motto prefixed to my paper, describes one of the despairing shepherds addressing himself to his mistress after the following manner: *Alas! what will become of me? wretch that I am! will you not hear me? I will throw off my cloaths, and take a leap into that part of the sea which is so much frequented by Olphis the sheperman. And though I should escape with my life, I know you will be pleased with it. I shall leave it with the Critics to determine whether the place, which this shepherd so particularly points out, was not the above-mentioned Leucase, or at least some other lovers leap, which was supposed to have had the same effect: I cannot believe, as all the interpreters do, that the shepherd means nothing further here than that he would drown himself, since he represents the issue of his leap as doubtful, by adding, that if he should escape with life,
The Spectator.

Mr. Spectator,

"The lover's leap which you mention in your 223d paper, was generally, I believe, a very effectual cure for love, and not only for love, but for all other evils. In short, Sir, I am afraid it was such a leap as that which Hero took to get rid of her passion for Leander. A man is in no great danger of breaking his heart, who breaks his neck to prevent it. I know very well the wonders which ancient authors relate concerning this leap; and in particular, that very many persons who tried it, escaped not only with their lives but their limbs. If by this means they got rid of their love, though it may in part be ascribed to the reasons you give for it; why may not we suppose, that the cold bath into which they plunged themselves, had also some share in their cure? A leap into the sea, or into any creek of salt waters, very often gives a new motion to the spirits, and a new turn to the blood; for which reason we prescribe it in distempers which no other medicine will reach. I could produce a quotation out of a very venerable author, in which the phrenzy produced by love, is compared to that which is produced by the biting of a mad dog. But as this comparison is a little too coarse for your paper, and might look as if it were cited to ridicule the author who has made use of it; I shall only hint at it, and desire you to consider whether, if the phrenzy produced by these two different causes be of the same nature, it may not very properly be cured by the same means.

I am, Sir, Your most humble Servant,

and well-wisher, ÆSCUAPIUS.

Mr. Spectator,

"I am a young woman crossed in love. My story is very long and melancholy. To give you the heads of it: a young gentleman, after having made his applications to me for three years together, and filled my head with a thousand dreams of happiness, some few days since married another. Pray tell me in what part of the world you your Promontory lies, which you call The Lovers Leap, and whether one may go to it by land? But, alas, I am afraid it has lost its virtue, and that a woman of our times will find no more relief in taking such a Leap, than in singing an Hymn to Venus. So that I must cry out with Dido in Dryden's Virgil,

_Ah! cruel Heaven, that made no cure for love!_

_Your disconsolate Servant, ATHENAIS._

_Mister Spectator,_

"_My_ heart is so full of loves and passions for Mrs. Gwynfrid, and she is so pettish, and over-run with Cholers against me, that if I had the good happiness to have my dwelling (which is placed by my Great-grandfather upon the bottom of an hill) no farther distance but twenty mile from the Lofe's Leap, I could indeed indue to break my neck upon it on purpose. Now, good Mister Spectator of Creete Pratton, you must know it, there is in Caernarvonshire a ferry pig mountain, the glory of all Wales, which it's named Penmain-maure, and you must also know it it's no great journey on foot from me; but the road is stony and bad for shooes. Now there is upon the forehead of this mountain a very high rock, (like a parish steeple) that cometh a huge deal over the sea; so when I am in my melancholies, and I do throw my self from it, I do desire my very good friend to tell me in his _Spectator_, if I shall be cure of my griefes loseth; for there is the sea clear as the clas, and as clear as the leek: then likewise, if I be drown, and break my neck, if Mrs. Gwynfrid will not loseth me afterwards. Pray be speedy in your answers, for I am in crete haste, and it is my desires to do my publikec without loseth of time. I remain with cordial affections, your ever loving friend,

_Davynth op Shenkyn._

_P.S._ "My Law-suits have brought me to London, but I have lost my causes, and so have made my resolutions to go down and leap before the frosts begin; for I am apt to take colds.

Ridicule, perhaps, is a better expedient against love than sober advice, and I am of opinion that _Hudibras_ and _Don Quixote_ may be as effectual to cure the extravagancies of this passion, as any of the old Philosophers.
I shall therefore publish, very speedily, the translation of a little Greek Manuscript, which is sent me by a learned friend. It appears to have been a piece of those records which were kept in the little temple of Apollo, that stood upon the promontory of Leucate. The reader will find it to be a summary account of several persons who tried the lovers leap, and of the successes they found in it. As there seem to be in it some Anachronisms and Deviations from the ancient Orthography, I am not wholly satisfied myself that it is authentic, and not rather the production of one of those Grecian Sophisters, who have imposed upon the world several spurious works of this nature. I speak this by way of precaution, because I know there are several writers, of uncommon erudition, who would not fail to expose my ignorance, if they caught me tripping in a matter of so great moment.

N° 229. Thursday, November 22.

---Spirat adhuc amor
Vroinque commissi calores
Æolhe fidibus puella.

Hor.

Among the many famous pieces of antiquity which are still to be seen at Rome, there is the Trunk of a Statue which has lost the arms, legs, and head; but discovers such an exquisite workmanship in what remains of it, that Michael Angelo declared he had learned his whole art from it. Indeed he studied it so attentively, that he made most of his Statues, and even his pictures in that Gusto, to make use of the Italian phrase; for which reason this maimed Statue is still called Michael Angelo’s School.

A fragment of Sappho, which I design for the subject of this paper, is in as great reputation among the Poets and Critics, as the mutilated figure above-mentioned is among the Statuaries and Painters. Several of our Country-men, and Mr. Dryden in particular, seem very often to have copied after it in their Dramatic writings, and in their poems upon love.

Whatever might have been the occasion of this Ode, the English Reader will enter into the beauties of it, if he supposes it to have been written.
ten in the person of a lover sitting by his Mistrefs. I shall set to view three different copies of this beautiful original: the first is a translation by Catullus, the second by Monfeur Boileau, and the last by a Gentleman whole translation of the Hymn to Venus has been so deservedly admired.

Ad LESBIAM.

Ile mi par esse deo videtur,
Ile s fas es, superare duos,
Qui sedens adversus identidem te,
Spelat, & audit
Dulce ridentem, misero quod omnis
Eripit sensus nibi: nam simul te
Lesbia, aspexi, nihil est super mi
Quod loquar amens.
Lingua fed torpet, tenuis sub artus
Flamma dimanat, sonitu suoporte
Tinuant aures, gemina teguntur
Lumina noti.

My learned Reader will know very well the reason why one of these verses is printed in Roman letter; and if he compares this translation with the original, he will find that the three first Stanzas are rendered almost word for word, and not only with the same elegance, but with the same short turn of expression which is so remarkable in the Greek, and so peculiar to the Sappho Ode. I cannot imagine why the reason Madam Dacier has told us, that this Ode of Sappho is preferred entire in Longinus, since it is manifest to any one who looks into that Author's quotations of it, that there must at least have been another Stanza, which is not transmitted to us.

The second translation of this fragment, which I shall here cite, is that of Monfeur Boileau.

Henreux! qui pres de toi, pour toi feule fonpire :
Lui joint du plaisir de l'entendre parler :
Qui te voit quelquefois doucement lui sourire.
Les Dieux, dans son bonheur, peuvent-ils l'égaler?
Je sens de veine en veine une subtile flamme
Couvrir par tout mon corps, si-fois que je te vois :
Et dans les doux transports, ou l'égare mon ame,

Un
Un nuage confus se répand sur ma vue,
Je n'entends plus, je tombe en de douces langueurs;
Et pâle, sans haleine, interdite, espéruée,
Un frisson me saisit, je tremble, je me meurs.

The Reader will see that this is rather an imitation than a translation. The circumstances do not lie so thick together, and follow one another with that vehemence and motion as in the original. In short, Monsieur Boileau has given us all the poetry, but not all the passion of this famous fragment. I shall in the last place present my Reader with the English translation.

I.
Blest as th' immortal Gods is he,
The youth who fondly fits by thee,
And bears and sees thee all the while Softly speak and sweetly smile.

II.
'Twas this depriv'd my soul of rest,
And rais'd such tumults in my breast;
For while I gaz'd, in transport toss,
My breath was gone, my voice was lost:

III.
My bosom glow'd; the subtle flame
Ran quick through all my vital frame;
O'er my dim eyes a darkness hung;
My ears with hollow murmurs rung.

IV.
In dewy damps my limbs were chill'd;
My blood with gentle horrors thrill'd;
My feeble pulse forgot to play;
I faint'd, sink'd, and dy'd away.

Instead of giving any character of this last translation, I shall defire my learned Reader to look into the criticisms which Longinus has made up, on the original. By that means he will know to which of the translations he ought to give the preference. I shall only add, that this translation is written in the very spirit of Sappho, and as near the Greek as the Genius of our language will possibly suffer.

Longinus has observed, that this description of Love in Sappho is an exact copy of Nature, and that all the circumstances, which follow one another another in such an hurry of sentiments, notwithstanding they appear repugnant to each other, are really such as happen in the phrenzies of love. I wonder that not one of the Critics or Editors, through whose hands this Ode has passed, has taken occasion from it to mention a circumstance related by Plutarch. That Author in the famous story of Antiochus, who fell in love with Stratonice, his Mother-in-law, and (not daring to discover his passion) pretended to be confined to his bed by his sickness, tells us, that Erasistratus, the physician, found out the nature of his distemper by those symptoms of love which he had learnt from Sappho's writings. Stratonice was in the room of the love-sick Prince, when these symptoms discovered themselves to his physician; and it is probable that they were not very different from those which Sappho here describes in a Lover fitting by his Mistrefs. This story of Antiochus is so well known, that I need not add the sequel of it, which has no relation to my present subject.

No. 231. Saturday, November 24.

O Pudor! O Pietas! ——

Mart.

LOOKING over the Letters which I have lately received from my correspondents, I met with the following one, which is written with such a spirit of politeness, that I could not but be very much pleased with it myself; and question not but it will be as acceptable to the Reader.

Mr. Spectator,

"You, who are no stranger to public assemblies, cannot but have observed the awe they often strike on such as are obliged to exert any talent before them. This is a sort of elegant distress, to which ingenious minds are the most liable, and may therefore deserve some remarks in your paper. Many a brave fellow, who has put his enemy to flight in the field, has been in the utmost disorder upon making a speech before a body of his friends at home: one would think..."
"think there was some kind of fascination in the eyes of a large circle of people, when darting all together upon one person. I have seen a new actor in a tragedy so bound up by it, as to be scarce able to speak or move, and have expected he would have died above three acts before the dagger or cup of poison were brought in. It would not be amiss, if such an one were at first introduced as a ghost, or a statue, till he recovered his spirits, and grew fit for some living part.

"As this sudden deftention of one's self shews a diffidence, which is not displeasing, it implies at the same time the greatest respect to an audience that can be. It is a sort of mute eloquence, which pleads for their favour much better than words could do; and we find their generosity naturally moved to support those who are in so much perplexity to entertain them. I was extremely pleased with a late instance of this kind at the Opera of Almabide, in the encouragement given to a young finger, whose more than ordinary concern on her first appearance, recommended her no less than her agreeable voice, and just performance. Meer bashfulness without merit is awkward; and merit without modesty, insolent. But modest merit has a double claim to acceptance, and generally meets with as many patrons as beholders.

It is impossible that a person should exert himself to advantage in an assembly, whether it be his part either to sing or speak, who lies under the great oppreßions of modesty. I remember, upon talking with a friend of mine concerning the force of pronunciation, our discourse led us into the enumeration of the several organs of speech which an orator ought to have in perfection, as the tongue, the teeth, the lips, the nose, the palate, and the wind-pipe. Upon which says my friend, you have omitted the most material organ of them all, and that is the forehead.

But notwithstanding an excess of modesty obstructs the tongue, and renders it unfit for its offices, a due proportion of it is thought requisite to an orator, that rhetoricians have recommended it to their disciples as a particular in their art. Cicero tells us, that he never liked an orator, who did not appear in some little confusion at the beginning of his speech, and confesses that he himself never entered upon an oration without trembling and concern. It is indeed a kind of deference which is due to a great assembly, and seldom fails to raise a benevolence in the audience towards the person who speaks. My correspondent has taken notice, that the bravest men often appear timorous on these occasions;
as indeed we may observe that there is generally no creature more impudent than a coward.

---Lingua melior; sed frigida bello

Dextera---

A bold tongue, and a feeble arm, are the qualifications of Drances in Virgil; as Homer, to express a man both timorous and fawzy, makes use of a kind of point, which is very rarely to be met with in his writings; namely, that he had the eyes of a dog, but the heart of a deer.

A just and reasonable modesty does not only recommend eloquence, but sets off every great talent which a man can be polifted of. It heightens all the virtues which it accompanies; like the shades in paintings, it raises and rounds every figure, and makes the colours more beautiful, though not so glaring as they would be without it.

Modesty is not only an ornament, but also a guard to virtue. It is a kind of quick and delicate Feeling in the soul, which makes her shrink and withdraw her self from every thing that has danger in it. It is such an exquisite sensibility, as warns her to shun the first appearance of every thing which is hurtful.

I cannot at present recollect either the place or time of what I am going to mention; but I have read somewhere in the history of ancient Greece, that the women of the country were feized with an accountable melancholy, which disposed several of them to make away with themselves. The senate, after having tried many expedients to prevent this self-murder, which was so frequent among them, published an edict, that if any woman whatever should lay violent hands upon herself, her corps should be exposèd naked in the street, and dragged about the city in the most public manner. This edict immediately put a stop to the practice which was before so common. We may see in this instance the strength of female modesty, which was able to overcome the violence even of madness and despair. The fear of shame in the fair sex, was in those days more prevalent than that of death.

If Modesty has so great an influence over our actions, and is in many cases so impregnable a fence to virtue; what can more undermine morality than that politeness which reigns among the unthinking part of mankind, and treats as unfastionable the most ingenious part of our behaviour; which recommends impudence as good breeding, and keeps a man always in countenance, not because he is innocent, but because he is shameless.

---Seneca---
Seneca thought Modesty so great a check to vice, that he preferred to us the practice of it in secret, and advises us to raise it in our selves upon imaginary occasions, when such as are real do not offer themselves: for this is the meaning of his precept, that when we are by our selves, and in our greatest solitudes, we should fancy that Cato stands before us, and sees every thing we do. In short, if you banish Modesty out of the world, she carries away with her half the virtue that is in it.

After these reflections on Modesty, as it is a virtue; I must observe, that there is a vicious Modesty, which justly deserves to be ridiculed, and which those persons very often discover, who value themselves most upon a well bred confidence. This happens when a man is ashamed to act up to his reason, and would not upon any consideration be surprized in the practice of those duties, for the performance of which he was sent into the world. Many an impudent libertine would blush to be caught in a serious discourse, and would scarce be able to shew his head, after having disclosed a religious thought. Decency of behaviour, all outward show of virtue, and abhorrence of vice, are carefully avoided by this set of shame-faced people, as what would disparage their gaiety of temper, and infallibly bring them to dishonour. This is such a poorness of spirit, such a despicable cowardise, such a degenerate abject state of mind as one would think humane nature incapable of, did we not meet with frequent instances of it in ordinary conversation.

There is another kind of vicious Modesty which makes a man ashamed of his person, his birth, his profession, his poverty, or the like misfortunes, which it was not in his choice to prevent, and is not in his power to rectify. If a man appears ridiculous by any of the aforementioned circumstances, he becomes much more so by being out of countenance for them. They should rather give him occasion to exert a noble spirit, and to palliate those imperfections which are not in his power, by those perfections which are; or to use a very witty allusion of an eminent author, he should imitate Caesar, who because his head was bald, covered that defect with laurels.
I shall, in this paper, discharge my self of the promise I have made to the public, by obliging them with a translation of the little Greek manuscript, which is said to have been a piece of those records that is preserved in the temple of Apollo upon the promontory of Leucate. It is a short history of the lover's leap, and is inscribed, An account of persons male and female, who offered up their vows in the temple of the Pythian Apollo, in the forty-sixth Olympiad, and leaped from the promontory of Leucate, into the Ionian sea, in order to cure themselves of the passion of love.

This account is very dry in many parts, as only mentioning the name of the lover who leaped, the person he leaped for, and relating in short, that he was either cured, or killed, or maimed, by the fall. It indeed gives the names of so many who died by it, that it would have looked like a bill of mortality, had I translated it at full length; I have therefore made an abridgment of it, and only extracted such particular passages as have something extraordinary, either in the case, or in the cure, or in the fate of the person who is mentioned in it. After this short preface, take the account as follows.

\textit{Cynisca, the wife of Eutyches, being in love with Lycus; and Eutyches her husband being in love with Euriilla; (which had made this married couple very uneasy to one another for several years) both the husband and the wife took the leap by consent; they both of them escaped, and have lived very happily together ever since.}
Larissa, a virgin of Thessaly, deserted by Plexippus, after a courtship of three years; she stood upon the brow of the promontory for some time, and having thrown down a ring, a bracelet, and a little picture, with other presents which she had received from Plexippus, she threw herself into the sea, and was taken up alive.

N.B. Larissa, before she leap'd, made an offering of a silver Cupid in the temple of Apollo.

Sinathra, in love with Daphnis the Myndian, perished in the fall.

Charixus, the brother of Sappho, in love with Rhodope the Courtezan, having spent his whole estate upon her, was advised by his sister to leap in the beginning of his amours, but would not hearken to her till he was reduced to his last talent; being forsaken by Rhodope, at length resolved to take the leap. Perished in it.

Arida, a beautiful youth of Epirus, in love with Praxioe, the wife of Thespius, escaped without damage, saving only that two of his fore-teeth were struck out, and his nose a little flattened.

Cleora, a widow of Ephesus, being inconsolable for the death of her husband, was resolved to take this leap, in order to get rid of her passion for his memory; but being arrived at the Promontory, she there met with Dimnaclus the Mileian, and after a short conversation with him, laid aside the thoughts of her leap, and married him in the temple of Apollo.

N.B. Her widow's weeds are still to be seen hanging up in the western corner of the temple.

Ophrion, the fisherman, having received a box on the head from Thespius the day before, and being determined to have no more to do with her, leaped, and escaped with life.

Atalanta, an old maid, whose cruelty had several years before driven two or three despairing lovers to this leap; being now in the fifty fifth year of her age, and in love with an officer of Sparta, broke her neck in the fall.

Hipparchus being passionately fond of his own wife, who was enamoured of Bathyllus, leaped and died of his fall; upon which his wife married her gallant.

Tetys, the Dancing-master, in love with Olympia an Athenian matron, threw himself from the rock with great agility, but was crippled in the fall.

Diogoras, the usurer, in love with his cook-maid, he peeped several times over the precipice, but his heart misgiving him, he went back, and married her that evening.
Citiusus, after having entred his own name in the Pythian records, being asked the name of the person whom he leaped for, and being ashamed to discover it, he was set aside, and not suffered to leap.

Eunice, a maid of Paphos aged nineteen, in love with Eurybates. Hurt in the fall, but recovered.

N. B. This was her second time of leaping.

Hesperus, a young man of Tarantum, in love with his Master's daughter. Drowned, the boats not coming in soon enough to his relief.

Sappho the Lesbian, in love with Phaon, arrived at the temple of Apollo, habited like a bride in garments as white as snow. She wore a garland of myrtle on her head, and carried in her hand the little musical instrument of her own invention. After having sung an hymn to Apollo, she hung up her garland on one side of his Altar, and her harp on the other. She then tuck'd up her vestments like a Spartan Virgin, and amidst thousands of spectators, who were anxious for her safety, and offered up vows for her deliverance, marched directly forwards to the utmost summit of the Promontory, where after having repeated a stanza of her own verses, which we could not hear, she threw her self off the rock with such an intrepidity, as was never before observed in any who had attempted that dangerous leap. Many, who were present, related, that they saw her fall into the sea, from whence she never rose again; though there were others who affirmed, that she never came to the bottom of her leap; but that she was changed into a Swan as she fell, and that they saw her hovering in the air under that shape. But whether or no the whiteness and fluttering of her garments might not deceive those who looked upon her, or whether she might not really be metamorphosed into that musical and melancholy bird, is still a doubt among the Lesbians.

Alcman, the famous Lyric Poet, who had for some time been passionately in love with Sappho, arrived at the Promontory of Leucate that very evening, in order to take the leap upon her account; but hearing that Sappho had been there before him, and that her body could be nowhere found, he very generously lamented her fall, and is said to have written his hundred and twenty fifth Ode upon that occasion.

Leaped in this Olympiad 259.

----- Populares

Vincentius brevitius ----- Hor.

There is nothing which lies more within the province of a Spectator than publick shows and diversions; and as among these there are none which can pretend to vie with those elegant entertainments that are exhibited in our Theatres, I think it particularly incumbent on me to take notice of every thing that is remarkable in such numerous and refined assemblies.

It is observed, that of late years, there has been a certain person in the upper gallery of the Play-house, who when he is pleased with anything that is acted upon the stage, expresses his approbation by a loud knock upon the benches or the waistcoat, which may be heard over the whole Theatre. This person is commonly known by the name of the Trunk-maker in the upper Gallery. Whether it be, that the blow he gives on these occasions resembles that which is often heard in the shops of such artisans, or that he was supposed to have been a real Trunk-maker, who after the finishing of his day’s work used to unbend his mind at these public diversions with his hammer in his hand, I cannot certainly tell. There are some, I know, who have been foolish enough to imagine it is a spirit which haunts the upper gallery, and from time to time makes those strange noises; and the rather, because he is observed to be louder than ordinary every time the Ghost of Hamlet appears. Others have reported that it is a dumb man, who has chosen this way of uttering himself, when he is transported with any thing he sees or hears. Others will have it to be the Play-house thunders, that exerts himself after this manner in the upper Gallery, when he has nothing to do upon the roof.

But having made it my business to get the best information I could in a matter of this moment, I find that the Trunk-maker, as he is commonly called, is a large black man, whom no body knows. He generally leans forward on a huge oaken plant with great attention to every thing that passes upon the stage. He is never seen to smile; but upon hearing any thing that pleases him, he takes up his staff with both hands, and lays it upon the next piece of timber that stands in his way with exceeding vehemence: after which he composes himself in his former posture, till such time as something new sets him again at work.

It has been observed his blow is so well timed, that the most judicious Critic could never except against it. As soon as any shining thought is expressed in the Poet, or any uncommon grace appears in the Actor, he smites the bench or wainscot. If the audience does not concur with him, he smites a second time; and if the audience is not yet awakened, looks round him with great wrath, and repeats the blow a third time, which never fails to produce the Clap. He sometimes lets the audience begin the Clap of themselves, and at the conclusion of their applaus e ratifies it with a single Thwack.

He is of so great use to the Play-house, that it is said a former Director of it, upon his not being able to pay his attendance by reason of illness, kept one in Pay to officiate for him till such time as he recovered;
but the person so employed, though he laid about him with incredible violence, did it in such wrong places, that the audience soon found out that it was not their old friend the Trunk-maker.

It has been remarked, that he has not yet exerted himself with vigour this season. He sometimes plies at the Opera; and upon Nicolini's first appearance, was said to have demolished three benches in the fury of his applause. He has broken half a dozen oaken plants upon Dogget, and felled goes away from a Tragedy of Shakespeare, without leaving the wainscot extremly shattered.

The players do not only connive at this his obstreperous approbation, but very cheerfully repair at their own cost whatever damage he makes.
They had once a thought of erecting a kind of wooden anvil for his use, that should be made of a very sounding plank, in order to render his strokes more deep and mellow; but as this might not have been difingueished from the mallet of a Kettle-drum, the project was laid aside.

In the mean while I cannot but take notice of the great use it is to an audience, that a person should thus preside over their heads, like the Director of a Confort, in order to awaken their attention, and best use of their applause; or, to raise my famile, I have sometimes fancied the Trunk-maker in the upper gallery to be like Virgil's Ruler of the wind, seated upon the top of a mountain, who, when he struck his Sceptre upon upon the side of it, roused an hurricane, and set the whole cavern in an uproar.

It is certain the Trunk-maker has saved many a good Play, and brought many a graceful actor into reputation, who would not otherwise have been taken notice of. It is very visible, as the audience is not a little abashed, if they find themselves betrayed into a Clap, when their friend in the upper gallery does not come into it; so the actors do not value themselves upon the Clap, but regard it as a mere brutum fulmen, or empty noise, when it has not the sound of the oaken plant in it. I know it has been given out by those who are enemies to the Trunk-maker, that he has sometimes been brib'd to be in the interest of a bad Poet or a vicious Player; but this is a surmise which has no foundation; his strokes are always just, and his admonitions seasonable; he does not deal about his blows at random, but always hits the right nail upon the head. That inexpressible force wherewith he lays them on, sufficiently shews the evidence and strength of his conviction. His Zeal for a good Author is indeed outrageous, and breaks down every fence and partition, every board and plank, that stands within the expression of his applause.

As I do not care for terminating my thoughts in barren Speculations, or in reports of pure matter of fact, without drawing something from them for the advantage of my Countrymen, I shall take the liberty to make an humble proposal, that whenever the Trunk-maker shall depart this life, or whenever he shall have lost the spring of his arm by sickness, old age, infirmity, or the like, some able-bodied Critic should be advanced to this post, and have a competent salary settled on him for life, to be furnished with Bamboos for Operas, Crabtree-cudgels for Comedies, and Oaken plants for Tragedy, at the public expence. And to the end that this place should be always disposed of according to Merit, I would have none preferred to it, who has not given convincing proofs both of a sound judgment and a strong arm, and who could not, upon occasion, either knock down an Ox, or write a comment upon Horace's Art of Poetry. In short, I would have him a due composition of Hercules and Apollo, and so rightly qualified for this important office, that the Trunk-maker may not be missed by our posterity.
It is very reasonable to believe, that part of the pleasure which happy minds shall enjoy in a future state, will arise from an enlarged contemplation of the divine wisdom in the government of the world, and a discovery of the secret and amazing steps of Providence, from the beginning to the end of time. Nothing seems to be an entertainment more adapted to the nature of man, if we consider that Curiosity is one of the strongest and most lasting appetites implanted in us, and that Admiration is one of our most pleasing passions; and what a perpetual succession of enjoyments will be afforded to both these, in a scene so large and various as shall then be laid open to our view in the society of superior spirits, who perhaps will join with us in so delightful a prospect!

It is not impossible, on the contrary, that part of the punishment of such as are excluded from Bliss, may consist not only in their being denied this privilege, but in having their appetites at the same time vitiately encreased, without any satisfaction afforded to them. In these, the vain pursuit of knowledge shall, perhaps, add to their infelicity, and bewilder them in labyrinths of error, darkens, distraction and uncertainty of every thing but their own evil state. Milton has thus represented the fallen Angels reasoning together in a kind of rhapsody from their corruptions, and creating to themselves a new delight amidst their very amusements; he could not properly have described the sports of condemned spirits, without that cast of horror and melancholy he has so judiciously mingled with them.

Others apart state on a hill retired,
In thoughts more elevate, and reason'd high
Of Providence, Foreknowledge, Will, and Fate,
First Fate, Freewill, Foreknowledge absolute,
And found no end, in wandring mazes lost.
In our present condition, which is a middle state, our minds are, as it were, chequered with truth and falsehood; and as our faculties are narrow and our views imperfect, it is impossible but our Curiosity must meet with many refusals. The business of mankind in this life being rather to act than to know, their portion of knowledge is dealt to them accordingly.

From hence it is, that the reason of the inquisitive has so long been exercised with difficulties, in accounting for the promiscuous distribution of good and evil to the virtuous and the wicked in this world. From hence come all those pathetic complaints of so many tragical events, which happen to the wise and the good; and of such surprising prosperity, which is often the reward of the guilty and the foolish; that reason is sometimes puzzled, and at a loss what to pronounce upon so mysterious a dispensation.

Plato expresses his abhorrence of some Fables of the Poets, which seem to reflect on the gods as the authors of injustice; and lays it down as a principle, that whatever is permitted to befall a just man, whether poverty, sickness, or any of those things which seem to be evils, shall either in life or death conducive to his good. My Reader will observe how agreeable this maxim is to what we find delivered by a greater authority. Seneca has written a discourse purposely on this subject, in which he takes pains, after the doctrine of the Stoics, to show, that adversity is not in itself an evil; and mentions a notable saying of Demetrius, That nothing would be more unhappy than a man who had never known affliction. He compares prosperity to the indulgence of a fond mother to a child, which often proves his ruin; but the affection of the divine Being to that of a wife, father, who would have his sons exerted with labour, disappointment, and pain, that they may gather strength, and improve their fortitude. On this occasion the Philosopher rises into that celebrated sentiment, That there is not on earth a spectacle more worthy the regard of a Creator intent on his works, than a brave man superior to his sufferings; to which he adds, That it must be a pleasure to Jupiter himself to look down from heaven, and see Cato amidst the ruins of his country preserving his integrity.

This thought will appear yet more reasonable, if we consider humane life as a state of probation, and adversity as the post of honour in it, affixed often to the best and most select spirits.

But what I would chiefly insist upon here, is, that we are not at present in a proper situation to judge of the counsels by which Providence acts, since since but little arrives at our knowledge, and even that little we discern imperfectly; or, according to the elegant figure in holy writ, we see but in part, and as in a glass darkly. It is to be considered that Providence in its OfEconomy regards the whole system of time and things together, so that we cannot discover the beautiful connexions between incidents which lie widely separated in time, and by losing too many links of the chain, our reasonings become broken and imperfect. Thus those parts in the moral world which have not an absolute, may yet have a relative beauty, in respect of some other parts concealed from us, but open to his eyes before whom past, present, and to come are set together in one point of view; and those events, the permission of which seems now to accuse his goodness, may in the consummation of things both magnify his goodness and exalt his wisdom. And this is enough to check our presumption, since it is in vain to apply our measures of regularity to matters of which we know neither the antecedents nor the consequent, the beginning nor the end.

I shall relieve my Readers from this abstracted thought, by relating here a Jewish tradition concerning Moses, which seems to be a kind of Parable, illustrating what I have last mentioned. That great Prophet, it is said, was called up by a voice from Heaven to the top of a mountain; where, in a conference with the Supreme Being, he was permitted to propose to him some questions concerning his administration of the Universe. In the midst of this divine colloquy he was commanded to look down on the Plain below. At the foot of the mountain there issued out a clear spring of water, at which a Soldier alighted from his horse to drink. He was no sooner gone than a little boy came to the same place, and finding a purse of gold which the Soldier had dropped, took it up and went away with it. Immediately after this came an infirm old man, weary with age and travelling, and having quenched his thirst, sat down to rest himself by the side of the spring. The Soldier missing his purse returns to search for it, and demands it of the old man, who affirms he had not seen it, and appeals to heaven in witness of his innocence. The Soldier not believing his protestations, kills him. Moses fell on his face with horror and amazement, when the Divine Voice thus prevented his expostulation; "Be not surprised, Moses; nor ask why the Judge of the whole earth has suffered this thing to come to pass: the child is the occasion of the blood of the old man to be shed; but know, that the old man whom thou savest, was the murderer of that child's father.
I have sometimes amused myself with considering the several methods of managing a debate, which have obtained in the world.

The first race of mankind used to dispute, as our ordinary people do now-a-days, in a kind of wild logic, uncultivated by rules of art. Socrates introduced a catechetical method of arguing. He would ask his adversary question upon question, till he had convinced him out of his own mouth that his opinions were wrong. This way of debating drives an enemy up into a corner, seizes all the passageways through which he can make an escape, and forces him to surrender at discretion.

Aristotle changed this method of attack, and invented a great variety of little weapons, called Syllogisms. As in the Socratic way of dispute you agree to every thing which your opponent advances, in the Aristotelian you are still denying and contradicting some part or other of what he says. Socrates conquers you by stratagem, Aristotle by force: the one takes the town by sally, the other sword in hand.

The universities of Europe, for many years, carried on their debates by Syllogism, in so much that we fee the knowledge of several centuries laid out into objections and answers; and all the good sense of the age cut and mincèd into almost an infinitude of distinctions.

When our universities found that there was no end of wrangling this way, they invented a kind of argument, which is not reducible to any mood or figure of Aristotle. It was called the Argumentum Basiliunum (others write it Basilium or Basilium) which is pretty well expressed in our English word Club-law. When they were not able to confute their antagonist, they knocked him down. It was their method in these polemical debates, first to discharge their syllogisms, and afterwards to betake themselves to their clubs, till such time as they had one way or other confounded their gain-sayers. There is in Oxford a narrow defile, (to make use of a military term) where the partisans used to encounter, for which which reason it still retains the name of Logie-Lane. I have heard an old gentleman, a physician, make his boast, that when he was a young fellow, he marched several times at the head of a troop of Scots, and cudgelled a body of Smigelsians half the length of High Street, till they had dispersed themselves for shelter into their respective garrisons.

This humour, I find, went very far in Erasmus's time. For that author tells us, that upon the revival of Greek letters, most of the Universities in Europe were divided into Greeks and Trojan's. The latter were those who bore a mortal hatred to the language of the Grecians, in no instance knowing that if they met with any who understood it, they did not fail to treat them as a foe. Erasmus himself had, it seems, the misfortune to fall into the hands of a party of Trojan's, who laid him on with so many blows and buffets, that he never forgot their hostilities to his dying day.

There is a way of managing an argument not much unlike the former, which is made use of by fates and communities, when they draw up a hundred thousand disputants on each side, and convince one another by dint of sword. A certain grand monarch was so sensible of his strength in this way of reasoning, that he wrote upon his great guns — Ratio ultima Regum, The Logic of Kings; but, God be thanked, he is now pretty well baffled at his own weapons. When one has to do with a Philosopher of this kind, one should remember the old gentleman's saying, who had been engaged in an argument with one of the Roman Emperors. Upon his friend's telling him, that he wondered he would give up the question, when he had visibly the better of the dispute, I am never ashamed, says he, to be confuted by one who is master of fifty legions.

I shall but just mention another kind of reasoning, which may be called arguing by poll; and another which is of equal force, in which wagers are made use of as arguments, according to the celebrated line in Hudibras.

But the most notable way of managing a controversy, is that which we call Arguing by torture. This is a method of reasoning which has been made use of with the poor refugees, and which was so fashionable in our country during the reign of Queen Mary, that in a passage of an author quoted by Monsieur Bayle, it is said the price of wood was raised in England by reason of the executions that were made in Smithfield. These disputants convince their adversaries with a Sorites, commonly called a pile of faggots. The rack is also a kind of syllogism which has been used with good effect, and has made multitudes of converts. Men were formerly disputed out of their doubts, reconciled to truth by force of reasons.
fon, and won over to opinions by the candour, sense and ingenuity of those who had the right on their side; but this method of conviction operated too slowly. Pain was found to be much more enlightening than reason. Every scruple was looked upon as obstinacy, and not to be removed but by several engines invented for that purpose. In a word, the application of whips, racks, gibbets, gallies, dungeons, fire and faggot in a dispute, may be looked upon as popish refinements upon the old heathen logic.

There is another way of reasoning, which seldom fails, though it be of a quite different nature to that I have last mentioned. I mean, convincing a man by ready money, or, as it is ordinarily called, bribing a man to an opinion. This method has often proved successful, when all the others have been made use of to no purpose. A man who is furnished with arguments from the mint, will convince the antagonist much sooner than one who draws them from reason and philosophy. Gold is a wonderful clearer of the understanding; it dissipates every doubt and scruple in an instant; accommodates it to the meanest capacities; silences the loud and clamorous, and brings over the most obstinate and inflexible.

Philip of Macedon was a man of most invincible reason this way. He refuted by it all the wisdom of Athens, confounded their statesmen, struck their orators dumb, and at length argued them out of all their liberties.

Having here touched upon the several methods of disputing, as they have prevailed in different ages of the world, I shall very suddenly give my reader an account of the whole art of cavilling; which shall be a full satisfactory answer to all such papers and pamphlets as have yet appeared against the Spectator.
Mr. Spectator,

Though you have considered virtuous love in most of its difficulties, I do not remember that you have given us any description upon the absence of lovers, or laid down any method by which they should support themselves under those long separations, which are sometimes forced to undergo. I am at present in this unhappy circumstance, having parted with the best of husbands, who is abroad in the service of his country, and may not possibly return for some years. His warm and generous affection while we were together, with the tenderness which he expressed to me at parting, make his absence almost insupportable. I think of him every moment of the day, and meet him every night in my dreams. Everything that passes me in mind of him. I apply my self with more than ordinary diligence to the care of his family and estate; but this instead of relieving me, gives me but so many occasions of wishing for his return. I frequent the rooms where I used to converse with him, and not meeting him there, sit down in his chair, and fall a weeping. I love to read the books he delighted in, and to converse with the persons whom he esteemed. I visit his picture a hundred times a day, and place myself over against it whole hours together. I pass a great part of my time in the walks where I used to lean upon his arm, and recollect in my mind the discourses which have there passed between us: I look over the several prospects and points of view which we used to survey together, fix my eye upon the objects which he has made me take notice of, and call to mind a thousand agreeable remarks which he has made on those occasions. I write to him by every conveyance, and contrary to other people, am always in good humour when an east wind blows, because it seldom fails of bringing me a letter from him.

Let me intreat you, Sir, to give me your advice upon this occasion, and to let me know how I may relieve my self in this my widowhood.

I am, SIR, your most humble Servant, ASTERIA.

Absence is what the Poets call Death in Love, and has given occasion to abundance of beautiful complaints in those Authors who have treated of this passion in verse. Ovid's Epistles are full of them. Orway's Minnias talks very tenderly upon this subject.

—It was not kind To leave me, like a Turtle, here alone, To droop, and mourn the absence of my mate. When thou art from me, every place is desart: And I methinks am savage and forlorn. Thy presence only 'tis can make me blessed, Heal my unquiet mind, and tune my soul.

The confections of lovers on these occasions are very extraordinary. Besides those mentioned by Asteria, there are many other motives of comfort, which are made use of by absent Lovers.

I remember in one of Scudery's romances, a couple of honourable Lovers agreed at their parting to set aside one half hour in the day to think of each other during a tedious absence. The romance tells us, that they both of them punctually observed the time thus agreed upon; and that whatever company or business they were engaged in, they left it abruptly as soon as the clock warned them to retire. The romance farther adds, that the Lovers expected the return of this stated hour with as much impatience, as if it had been a real persuasion, and enjoyed an imaginary happiness that was almoft as pleasing to them as what they would have found from a real meeting. It was an inexplicable satisfaction to these divided Lovers to be assured that each was at the same time employed in the same kind of contemplation, and making equal returns of tenderness and affection.

If I may be allowed to mention a more serious expedient for the alleviating of absence, I shall take notice of one which I have known two persons practice, who joined religion to that elegance of sentiments with which the passion of Love generally inspires its votaries. This was, at the return of such an hour, to offer up a certain prayer for each other, which they had agreed upon before their parting. The husband who is a man that makes a figure in the polite world, as well as in his own family, has often told me that he could not have supported an absence of three years without this expedient.

Strada in one of his prolixities gives an account of a chimerical correspondence between two friends by the help of a certain loadstone, which had such a virtue in it, that if it touched two or several needles, when one of the needles so touched began to move, the other, though at no small distance, moved at the same time and in the same manner. He tells us, that the two friends, being each of them possessed of one of the needles, made a kind of Dial-plate, inscribing it with the four and twenty letters, in the same manner as the hours of the day are marked upon the ordinary Dial-plate. They then fixed one of the needles on each of these plates in such a manner, that it could move round without impediment, so as to touch any of the four and twenty letters. Upon their separating from one another into distant countries, they agreed to withdraw themselves punctually into their closets at a certain hour of the day, and to converse with one another by means of this their invention. Accordingly when they were some hundred miles asunder, each of them that himself up in his closet at the time appointed, and immediately cast his eye upon his Dial-plate. If he had a mind to write any thing to his friend, he directed his needle to every letter that formed the words which he had occasion for, making a little pause at the end of every word or sentence, to avoid confusion. The friend, in the mean while, saw his own sympathetick needle moving of itself to every letter which that of his correspondent pointed at. By this means they talked together across a whole Continent, and conveyed their thoughts to one another in an instant over cities or mountains, seas or deserts.

If Monsieur Scudery, or any other writer of romance, had introduced a Necromancer, who is generally in the train of a Knight-errant, making a present to two Lovers of a couple of these above-mentioned needles, the Reader would not have been a little pleased to have seen them corresponding with one another when they were guarded by spies and watches, or separated by cafiles and adventures.

In the mean while, if ever this invention should be revived or put in practice, I would propose, that upon the Lover’s Dial-plate there should be written not only the four and twenty letters, but several entire words which have always a place in passionate epistles, as Flames, Darts, Die, Langage.
Do not remember to have read any discourse written expressly upon the beauty and loveliness of virtue, without considering it as a duty, and as the means of making us happy both now and hereafter. I design therefore this Speculation as an essay upon that subject, in which I shall consider virtue no further than as it is in itself an amiable nature, after having premised, that I understand by the word Virtue such a general notion as is affixed to it by the writers of morality, and which by devout men generally goes under the name of Religion, and by men of the world under the name of Honour.

Hypocrisy itself does great honour, or rather justice, to religion, and tacitly acknowledges it to be an ornament to humane nature. The Hypocrite would not be at so much pains to put on the appearance of virtue, if he did not know it was the most proper and effectual means to gain the love and esteem of mankind.

We learn from Hierocles it was a common saying among the heathens, that the wise man hates no body, but only loves the virtuous. Tully has a very beautiful gradation of thoughts, to show how amiable virtue is. We love a virtuous man, says he, who lives in the remotest parts of the earth, though we are altogether out of the reach of his virtue, and can receive from it no manner of benefit; nay, one who died several ages ago, raises a secret fondness and benevolence for him in our minds, when we read his story: nay, what is still more, one who has been the enemy.
enemy of our country, provided his wars were regulated by justice and humanity, as in the instance of Pyrrhus, whom Tully mentions on this occasion in opposition to Hamilcar. Such is the natural beauty and loves.

Stoicism, which was the pedantry of Virtue, ascribes all good qualifications of what kind soever to the virtuous man. Accordingly Cato, in the character Tully has left of him, carried matters so far, that he would not allow any one but a virtuous man to be handsome. This indeed looks more like a philosophical rant, than the real opinion of a wise man; yet this was what Cato very seriously maintained. In short, the Stoics thought they could not sufficiently represent the excellence of virtue, if they did not comprehend in the notion of it all possible perfection; and therefore did not only suppose, that it was transcendently beautiful in itself, but that it made the very body amiable, and banished every kind of deformity from the person in whom it resided.

It is a common observation, that the most abandoned to all sense and goodnes, are apt to with those who are related to them of a different character; and it is very observable, that none are more struck with the charms of virtue in the fair sex, than those who by their very admiration of it are carried to a desire of ruining it.

A virtuous mind in a fair body is indeed a fine picture in a good light, and therefore it is no wonder that it makes the beautiful sex all over Charms.

As virtue in general is of an amiable and lovely nature, there are some particular kinds of it which are more so than others, and these are such as dispose us to do good to mankind. Temperance and abstinence, faith and devotion, are in themselves perhaps as laudable as any other virtues; but those which make a man popular and beloved, are justice, charity, munificence, and in short all the qualifications that render us beneficial to each other. For which reason even an extravagant man, who has nothing else to recommend him but a false generosity, is often more beloved and esteemed than a person of a much more finished character, who is defective in this particular.

The two great ornaments of virtue, which shew her in the most advantageous views, and make her altogether lovely, are clearness and good nature. These generally go together, as a man cannot be agreeable to others who is not easy within himself. They are both very requisite in a virtuous mind, to keep out melancholy from the many serious thoughts it is engaged in, and to hinder its natural hatred of vice from souring into severity and cenforiousness.
If virtue is of this amiable nature, what can we think of those who can look upon it with an eye of hatred and ill-will, or can suffer their aversion for a party to blot out all the Merit of the person who is engaged in it. A man must be excessively stupid, as well as uncharitable, who believes that there is no virtue but on his own side, and that there are not men as honest as himself who may differ from him in political principles. Men may oppose one another in some particulars, but ought not to carry their hatred to those qualities which are of so amiable a nature in themselves, and have nothing to do with the points in dispute. Men of virtue, though of different interests, ought to consider themselves as more nearly united with one another, than with the vicious part of mankind, who embark with them in the same civil concerns. We should bear the same love towards a man of honour, who is a living antagonist, which Tully tells us in the forementioned passage every one naturally does to an enemy that is dead. In short, we should esteem virtue though in a foe, and abhor vice though in a friend.

I speak this with an eye to those cruel treatments which men of all sides are apt to give the characters of those who do not agree with them. How many persons of undoubted probity and exemplary virtue, on either side, are blackened and defamed? How many men of honour exposed to public obloquy and reproach? Those therefore who are either the instruments or abettors in such infernal dealings, ought to be looked upon as persons who make use of religion to promote their cause, not of their cause to promote religion.

No. 245. Tuesday, December 11.

There is nothing which one regards so much with an eye of mirth and pity, as innocence when it has in it a dash of folly. At the same time that one esteems the virtue, one is tempted to laugh at the simplicity which accompanies it. When a man is made up wholly of the Dove, without the least grain of the Serpent in his composition... position, he becomes ridiculous in many circumstances of life, and very often discredits his best actions. The Cordelliers tell a story of their Founder St. Francis, that as he passed the streets in the dusk of the evening, he discovered a young fellow with a maid in a corner; upon which the good man, say they, lifted up his hands to Heaven with a secret thanksgiving, that there was still so much Christian charity in the world. The innocence of the Saint made him mistake the kiss of a lover for a salute of charity. I am heartily concerned when I see a virtuous man without a competent knowledge of the world; and if there be any use in these my papers, it is this, that without representing vice under any false alluring notions, they give the reader an insight into the ways of men, and represent humane nature in all its changeable colours. The man who has not been engaged in any of the follies of the world, or, as Shakespeare expresses it, 'hacked off in the ways of men,' may here find a picture of its follies and extravagances. The virtuous and the innocent may know in speculation what they could never arrive at by practice, and by this means avoid the snare of the crafty, the corruptions of the vicious, and the reasonings of the prejudiced. Their minds may be opened without being vitiated.

It is with an eye to my following correspondent, Mr. Timothy Doodle, who seems a very well-meaning man, that I have written this short preface, to which I shall subjoin a letter from the said Mr. Doodle.

SIR,

"I could heartily wish that you would let us know your opinion upon several innocent diversions which are in use among us, and which are very proper to pass away a winter night for those who do not care to throw away their time at an Opera, or at the Play-house. I would gladly know in particular what notion you have of hot-cockeys; as also whether you think that questions and commands, mottoes, similes, and cross purposes have not more mirth and wit in them, than those public diversions which are grown so very fashionable among us. If you would recommend to our wives and daughters, who read your papers with a great deal of pleasure, some of those sports and pastimes that may be practised within doors, and by the fireside, we who are matters of families should be hugely obliged to you. I need not tell you that I would have these sports and pastimes not only merry but innocent, for which reason I have not mentioned either Whisk or Lanterloo, nor indeed so much as One and thirty. After having" having communicated to you my request upon this subject, I will be so free as to tell you how my wife and I pass away these tedious winter evenings with a great deal of pleasure. Though she be young, and handsome, and good-humoured to a miracle, she does not care for gadding abroad like others of her sex. There is a very friendly man, a Colonel in the army, whom I am mightily obliged to for his civili-ties, that comes to see me almost every night; for he is not one of those giddy young fellows that cannot live out of a play-house. When we are together, we very often make a party at blind-man’s-buff, which is a sport that I like the better, because there is a good deal of exercise in it. The Colonel and I are blinded by turns, and you would laugh your heart out to see what pains my dear takes to hoodwink us, so that it is impossible for us to see the least glimpse of light.
The poor Colonel sometimes hits his note against a post, and makes us die with laughing. I have generally the good luck not to hurt my self, but am very often above half an hour before I can catch either of them; for you must know we hide our selves up and down in corners, that we may have the more sport. I only give you this hint as a sample of such innocent diversions as I would have you recommend;
and am,

Most esteemed Sir,
your ever loving friend, Timothy Doodle.

The following letter was occasioned by my last Thursday’s paper upon the absence of lovers, and the methods therein mentioned of making such absence supportable.

Sir,

Among the several ways of consolation which absent lovers make use of while their souls are in that state of departure, which you say is death in love, there are some very material ones, that have escaped your notice. Among these, the first and most received is a crooked shilling, which has administered great comfort to our fore-thers, and is still made use of on this occasion with very good effect in most parts of her Majesty’s dominions. There are some, I know, who think a crown piece cut into two equal parts, and preferred by the distant lovers, is of more sovereign virtue than the former. But since opinions are divided in this particular, why may not the same persons make use of both? The figure of a heart, whether cut in stone or.
or cast in metal, whether bleeding upon an Altar, stung with darts, or held in the hand of a Cupid, has always been looked upon as talismanic in distresses of this nature. I am acquainted with many a brave fellow, who carries his mistress in the lid of his snuff-box, and by that expedient has supported himself under the absence of a whole campaign. For my own part, I have tried all these remedies, but never found so much benefit from any as from a ring, in which my mistress's hair is plaited together very artificially in a kind of true-lover's knot.
As I have received great benefit from this secret, I think myself obliged to communicate it to the public, for the good of my fellow-subjects. I desire you will add this letter as an appendix to your comunications upon absence, and so

Your very humble Servant, T. B.

I shall conclude this paper with a letter from an university gentleman, occasioned by my last Tuesday's paper, wherein I gave some account of the great feuds which happened formerly in those learned bodies, between the modern Greeks and Trojans.

SIR,

This will give you to understand, that there is at present in the society, whereof I am a member, a very considerable body of Trojans, who, upon a proper occasion, would not fail to declare our selves. In the meanwhile we do all we can to annoy our enemies by fratagem, and are resolved, by the first opportunity, to attack Mr. Joshua Barnes, whom we look upon as the Achilles of the opposite party. As for myself, I have had the reputation, ever since I came from school, of being a trusty Trojan, and am resolved never to give quarter to the smallest particle of Greek, where-ever I chance to meet it.
It is for this reason I take it very ill of you, that you sometimes hang out Greek colours at the head of your paper, and sometimes give a word of the enemy even in the body of it. When I meet with any thing of this nature, I throw down your Speculations upon the table; with that form of words which we make use of when we declare war upon an author,

Graecum est, non potest legi.

I give you this hint, that you may for the future abstain from any such hostilities at your peril.

Trosus.

Thursday,
We are told by some ancient authors, that Socrates was instructed in eloquence by a woman, whose name, if I am not mistaken, was Aspasia. I have indeed very often looked upon that art as the most proper for the female sex, and I think the Universities would do well to consider whether they should not fill their rhetoric chairs with their professors.

It has been said in the praise of some men, that they could talk whole hours together upon any thing; but it must be owned to the honour of the other sex, that there are many among them who can talk whole hours together upon nothing. I have known a woman branch out into a long extempore dissertation upon the edging of a petticoat, and chide her servant for breaking a china cup, in all the figures of rhetoric.

Were women admitted to plead in courts of judicature, I am persuaded they would carry the eloquence of the bar to greater heights than it has yet arrived at. If any one doubts this, let him but be present at those debates which frequently arise among the Ladies of the British fishery.

The first kind of female Orators which I shall take notice of, are those who are employed in stirring up the passions, a part of rhetoric in which Socrates his wife had perhaps made a greater proficiency than his above-mentioned teacher.

The second kind of female Orators are those who deal in invectives, and who are commonly known by the name of the cenforious. The imagination and eloquence of this sort of rhetoricians is wonderful. With what a fluency of invention, and copiousness of expression, will they enlarge upon every little flip in the behaviour of another? With how many different circumstances, and with what variety of phrases, will they tell over the same story? I have known an old Lady make an unhappy marriage the subject of a month’s conversation. She blamed the bride in one place, pitied her in another; laughed at her in a third; wondered at her... in a fourth; was angry with her in a fifth; and in short, wore out a pair of coach-horses in expressing her concern for her. At length, after having quite exhausted the subject on this side, she made a visit to the new-married pair, praised the wife for the prudent choice she had made, told her the unreasonable reflections which some malicious people had cast upon her, and desired that they might be better acquainted. The censure and approbation of this kind of women are therefore only to be considered as helps to discourse.

A third kind of female Orators may be comprehended under the word Gossip. Mrs. Fiddle Faddle is perfectly accomplished in this sort of eloquence; she launches out into descriptions of christenings, runs divisions upon an head-dress, knows every dish of meat that is served up in her neighbourhood, and entertains her company a whole afternoon together with the wit of her little boy, before he is able to speak.

The Coquette may be looked upon as a fourth kind of female Orator. To give her self the larger field for discourse, she hates and loves in the same breath, talks to her lap-dog or parrot, is uneasy in all kinds of weather; and in every part of the room: She has false quarrels and feigned obligations to all the men of her acquaintance; sighs when she is not sad, and laughs when she is not merry. The Coquette is in particular a great mistress of that part of oratory which is called action, and indeed seems to speak for no other purpose, but as it gives her an opportunity of flirling a limb, or varying a feature, of glancing her eyes, or playing with her fan.

As for news-mongers, politicians, mimicks, story-tellers, with other characters of that nature, which give birth to loquacity, they are as commonly found among the men as the women; for which reason I shall pass them over in silence.

I have been often puzzled to assign a cause why women should have this talent of a ready utterance in so much greater perfection than men. I have sometimes fancied that they have not a retentive power, the faculty of suppressing their thoughts, as men have, but that they are necessitated to speak every thing they think; and if so, it would perhaps furnish a very strong argument to the Cartesians, for the supporting of their doctrine, that the soul always thinks. But as several are of opinion that the fair sex are not altogether strangers to the arts of diffusing, and concealing their thoughts, I have been forced to relinquish that opinion, and have therefore endeavored to seek after some better reason. In order to it, a friend of mine, who is an excellent anatomist, has promised me by the first opportunity to dissect a woman’s tongue, and to examine whether there may not be in it certain juices which render it so... wonderfully voluble or flippant, or whether the fibres of it may not be made up of a finer or more pliant thread, or whether there are not in it some particular muscles, which dart it up and down by such sudden glances and vibrations; or whether, in the last place, there may not be certain undiscovered channels running from the head and the heart, to this little instrument of eloquence, and conveying into it a perpetual influence of animal spirits. Nor must I omit the reason which Hudibras has given, why those who can talk on trifles speak with the greatest fluency; namely, that the tongue is like a race-horse, which runs the faster the fatter weight it carries.

Which of these reasons ever may be looked upon as the most probable, I think the Irishman's thought was very natural, who after some hours conversation with a female Orator told her, that he believed her tongue was very glad when she was asleep, for that it had not a moment's rest all the while she was awake.

That excellent old ballad of the Wanton Wife of Bath has the following remarkable lines:

I think, quoth Thomas, women's tongues
Of aspen leaves are made.

And Ovid, though in the description of a very barbarous circumstance, tells us, that when the tongue of a beautiful female was cut out, and thrown upon the ground, it could not forbear muttering even in that posture

—Comprehensam sordis linguan
Absultit ensis ferro. Radix micat ultima linguae.
Ipfa jacet, terraque tremens immurrurat atra;
Utque fata foli mutata cauda colubra, Palpitat.

If a tongue would be talking without a mouth, what could it have done when it had all its organs of speech, and accomplices of sound about it? I might here mention the story of the pippin-woman, had I some reason to look upon it as fabulous.

I must confess I am so wonderfully charmed with the music of this little instrument, that I would by no means discourage it. All that I aim at by this dissertation is, to cure it of several disagreeable notes, and in particular of those little jarrings and dissonances which arise from anger, cenfuriousness, gossiping and coquetry. In short, I would have it always tuned by good-nature, truth, discretion and sincerity.

Saturday,
W
When I make choice of a subject that has not been treated on by others, I throw together my reflections on it without any order or method, so that they may appear rather in the loose-ness and freedom of an Essay, than in the regularity of a set discours.
It is after this manner that I shall consider Laughter and Ridicule in my present paper.

Man is the merriest species of the creation, all above and below him are serious. He sees things in a different light from other Beings, and finds his mirth rising from objects that perhaps cause something like pity or displeasure in higher natures. Laughter is indeed a very good coun-terpoise to the spleen; and it seems but reasonable that we should be capable of receiving joy from what is no real good to us, since we can receive grief from what is no real evil.

I have in my forty-seventh paper raised a Speculation on the notion of a modern Philosopher, who describes the first motive of Laughter to be a secret comparison which we make between our selves, and the persons we laugh at; or, in other words, that satisfaction which we receive from the opinion of some pre-eminence in our selves, when we see the absurd-dities of another, or when we reflect on any past absurdities of our own.
This seems to hold in most cafes, and we may observe that the vainest part of mankind are the most addicted to this passion.

I have read a sermon of a Conventual in the Church of Rome, on those words of the wise man, I said of Laughter, it is mad; and of Mirth, what does it? Upon which he laid it down as a point of doctrine, that Laughter was the effect of original sin, and that Adam could not laugh before the Fall.

Laughter, while it lasts, slackens and unbraces the mind, weakens the faculties, and causes a kind of remissness and dilution in all the powers of the soul: and thus far it may be looked upon as a weakens in the composi-composition of humane nature. But if we consider the frequent reliefs we receive from it, and how often it breaks the gloom which is apt to depress the mind and damp our spirits with transient and unexpected gleams of joy, one would take care not to grow too wise for so great a pleasure of life.

The talent of turning men into ridicule, and exposing to laughter those one converses with, is the qualification of little ungenerous tempers. A young man with this cast of mind cuts himself off from all manner of improvement. Every one has his flaws and weaknesses; nay, the greatest blemishes are often found in the moit shining characters; but what an absurd thing is it to pass over all the valuable parts of a man, and fix our attention on his infirmities? to observe his imperfections more than his virtues? and to make use of him for the sport of others, rather than for our own improvement?

We therefore very often find, that persons the most accomplished in ridicule, are those who are very shrewd at hitting a blot, without exerting any thing matterly in themselves. As there are many eminent Critics who never write a good line, there are many admirable Buffoons that animadvert upon every single defect in another, without ever discovering the least beauty of their own. By this means, these unlucky little Wits often gain reputation in the esteem of vulgar minds, and raise themselves above persons of much more laudable characters.

If the talent of Ridicule were employed to laugh men out of vice and folly, it might be of some use to the world; but instead of this, we find that it is generally made use of to laugh men out of virtue and good sense, by attacking every thing that is solemn and serious, decent and praise-worthy in humane life.

We may observe, that in the first Ages of the world, when the great Souls and master-pieces of humane nature were produced, men shined by a noble simplicity of behaviour, and were strangers to those little embellishments which are so fashionable in our present conversation. And it is very remarkable, that notwithstanding we fall short at present of the Ancients in poetry, painting, oratory, history, architecture, and all the noble arts and sciences which depend more upon genius than experience, we exceed them as much in doggerel, humour, burlesque, and all the trivial arts of Ridicule. We meet with more racyery among the moderns, but more good sense among the ancients.

The two great branches of Ridicule in writing are Comedy and Burlesque. The first ridicules persons by drawing them in their proper characters, acters, the other by drawing them quite unlike themselves. Burlesque is therefore of two kinds; the first represents mean persons in accoutrements of Heroes, the other describes great persons acting and speaking like the basest among the people. Don Quixote is an instance of the first, and Lucian's gods of the second. It is a dispute among the Critics, whether burlesque poetry runs best in heroic verse, like that of the Dispensary, or in doggerel, like that of Hudibras. I think where the low character is to be railed, the heroic is the proper measure; but when an He-roe is to be pulled down and degraded, it is done best in doggerel.

If Hudibras had been set out with as much wit and humour in heroic verse as he is in doggerel, he would have made a much more agreeable figure than he does; though the generality of his Readers are so wonderfully pleased with the double Rhymes, that I do not expect many will be of my opinion in this particular.

I shall conclude this Essay upon Laughter with observing, that the metaphor of laughing, applied to fields and meadows when they are in flower, or to trees when they are in blossom, runs through all languages; which I have not observed of any other metaphor, excepting that of fire and burning when they are applied to love. This shews that we naturally regard Laughter, as what is in it self both amiable and beautiful. For this reason likewise Venus has gained the title of la Vénus joyeuse, the Laughter-loving Dame, as Waller has translated it, and is represented by Horace as the goddess who delights in Laughter. Milton, in a joyous assembly of imaginary personages, has given us a very poetical figure of Laughter. His whole band of mirth is so finely describ'd, that I shall let the passage down at length.

But come thou goddess fair and free,
In Heaven yeap'd Euphrosyne,
And bring me, heart-easing mirth,
Whom lovely Venus att a birth
With two Sister Graces more
To Icy-crowned Bacchus bore:
Haste thee Nymph, and bring with thee
Jest and youthful jollity,
Quips and cracks, and wanton wiles,
Nods, and beck's, and wreathed smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek;

Sport that wrinkled care derides,
And laughter holding both his sides.
Come, and trip it as you go,
On the light fantastick toe,
And in thy right hand lead with thee
The mountain Nymph, sweet Liberty;
And if I give thee honour due,
Mirth, admit me of thy cure,
To live with her, and live with thee,
In unproved pleasures free.

— Lingue centum sunt, oraque centum, Ferrea vox. —— Virg.

THERE is nothing which more astonishes a foreigner and frights a country Squire, than the Cries of London. My good friend Sir Roger often declares that he cannot get them out of his head, or go to sleep for them, the first week that he is in town. On the contrary, W. Honeycomb calls them the Ramage de la Ville, and prefers them to the sounds of larks and nightingales, with all the musick of the fields and woods. I have lately received a letter from some very odd fellow upon this subject, which I shall leave with my Reader, without saying any thing further of it.

SIR,
"I am a man out of all business, and would willingly turn my head to any thing for an honest livelihood. I have invented several projects for raising millions of money without burthening the Subject, but I cannot get the Parliament to listen to me, who look upon me, forsooth, as a crack and a projector; so that despairing to enrich either my self or my country by this publick-spiritednes, I would make some pro-
proposals to you relating to a design which I have very much at heart; and which may procure me an handsome subsistence, if you will be pleased to recommend it to the cities of London and Westminster.

The post I would aim at is to be Comptroller-general of the London Cries, which are at present under no manner of rules or discipline. I think I am pretty well qualified for this place, as being a man of very strong lungs, of great insight into all the branches of our British trades and manufactures, and of a competent skill in music.

The Cries of London may be divided into vocal and instrumental.
As for the latter, they are at present under a very great disorder. A Freeman of London has the privilege of disturbing a whole street for an hour together, with the twinkling of a brass-kettle or a frying-pan.
The Watchman's thump at midnight startles us in our beds, as much as the breaking in of a thief. The Sowgelder's horn has indeed something musical in it, but this is seldom heard within the liberties. I would therefore propose, that no instrument of this nature should be made use of, which I have not tuned and licensed, after having carefully examined in what manner it may affect the ears of her Majesty's liege subjects.

Vocal Cries are of a much larger extent, and indeed so full of in-congruities and barbarisms, that we appear a distracted city to foreigners, who do not comprehend the meaning of such enormous outcry.
Milk is generally sold in a note above Ela, and in sounds so exceeding thrill, that it often sets our teeth on edge. The Chimney-sweeper is confined to no certain pitch; he sometimes uttereth himself in the deepest base, and sometimes in the sharpest treble; sometimes in the highest, and sometimes in the lowest note of the Gamut. The same observation might be made on the retailers of Small-coal, not to mention broken glasse or brick-duft. In these therefore, and the like cases, it should be my care to sweeten and mellow the voices of these itinerant tradesmen, before they make their appearance in our streets, as also to accommodate their cries to their respective wares; and to take care in particular that those may not make the most noise who have the least to sell, which is very observable in the vendors of Card-matches, to whom I cannot but apply that old proverb of Much cry but little coal.

Some of these last-mentioned Musicians are so very loud in the sale of these trifling manufactures, that an honest splenetic Gentleman, of my acquaintance bargained with one of them never to come into the free
The SPECTATOR.

"Street where he lived: but what was the effect of this contract? Why, the whole tribe of Cardmatch-makers which frequent the quarter, passed by his door the very next day, in hopes of being bought off after the same manner.

"It is another great imperfection in our London Cries, that there is no just time nor measure observed in them. Our news should indeed be published in a very quick time; because it is a commodity that will not keep cold. It should not however be cried with the same precipitation as Fire: yet this is generally the case; a bloody battle alarms the town from one end to another in an instant. Every motion of the French is published in so great a hurry, that one would think the enemy were at our gates. This likewise I would take upon me to regulate in such a manner, that there should be some distinction made between the spreading of a victory, a march, or an incampment, a Dutch, a Portugal, or a Spanish Mail. Nor must I omit under this head, those excessive alarms with which several boisterous rudlicks infest our streets in Turnip-season; and which are more inexcusable, because these are wares which are in no danger of cooling upon their hands.

"There are others who affect a very slow time, and are in my opinion much more tunable than the former; the Cooper in particular swells his last note in an hollow voice, that is not without its harmony; nor can I forbear being inspired with a most agreeable melancholy, when I hear that sad and solemn air with which the publick is very often asked, if they have any Chairs to mend? Your own memory may suggest to you many other lamentable ditties of the same nature, in which the music is wonderfully languishing and melodious.

"I am always pleased with that particular time of the year which is proper for the pickling of Dill and Cucumbers; but, alas, this Cry, like the song of the Nightingale, is not heard above two months. It would therefore be worth while, to consider whether the same Air might not in some cases be adapted to other words.

"It might likewise deserve our most serious consideration, how far, in a well-regulated city, those humourists are to be tolerated, who, not contented with the traditional cries of their forefathers, have invented particular songs and tunes of their own: such as was, not many years since, the Patry-man, commonly known by the name of the Colly-molly-puff; and such as is at this day the vender of powder and wash-balls, who, if I am rightly informed, goes under the name of Powder-Wan.
"I must not here omit one particular absurdity which runs through this whole vociferous generation, and which renders their Cries very often not only incommodious, but altogether useless to the publick: I mean that idle accomplishment which they all of them aim at, of crying so as not to be understood. Whether or no they have learned this from several of our affected singers, I will not take upon me to say; but most certain it is, that people know the wares they deal in rather by their tunes than by their words; insomuch that I have sometimes seen a country boy run out to buy apples of a Bellows-mender, and Ginger-bread from a grinder of knives and scissors. Nay, so strangely infatuated are some very eminent artists of this particular grace in a Cry, that none but their acquaintance are able to guess at their profession; for who else can know, that Work if I had it, should be the signification of a Corn-cutter?"

"Forasmuch therefore as persons of this rank are seldom men of genius or capacity, I think it would be very proper that some man of good sense and sound judgment should preside over these publick cries, who should permit none to lift up their voices in our streets, that have not tuneable throats, and are not only able to overcome the noise of the crowd, and the rattling of coaches, but also to vend their respective merchandizes in apt phrases, and in the most distinct and agreeable sounds. I do therefore humbly recommend myself as a person rightly qualified for this post; and if I meet with fitting encouragement, I shall communicate some other projects which I have by me, that may no less conduce to the emolument of the publick.

I am, SIR, &c.

Ralph Crotchett.

There is nothing which more denotes a great mind, than the abhorrence of envy and detraction. This passion reigns more among bad Poets, than among any other set of men.

As there are none more ambitious of fame, than those who are conversant in Poetry, it is very natural for such as have not succeeded in it, to depreciate the works of those who have. For since they cannot pride themselves to the reputation of their fellow-writers, they must endeavour to sink it to their own pitch, if they would still keep themselves upon a level with them.

The greatest wits that ever were produced in one age, lived together in so good an understanding, and celebrated one another with so much generosity, that each of them receives an additional lustre from his contemporaries, and is more famous for having lived with men of so extraordinary a genius, than if he had himself been the sole wonder of the age. I need not tell my Reader, that I here point at the reign of Augustus, and I believe he will be of my opinion, that neither Virgil nor Horace would have gained so great a reputation in the world, had they not been the friends and admirers of each other. Indeed all the great writers of that age, for whom singly we have so great an esteem, stand up together as vouchers for one another's reputation. But at the same time that Virgil was celebrated by Gallus, Propertius, Horace, Varius, Tucca and Ovid, we know that BLivus and Macro were his declared foes and calumniators.

In our own country a man seldom sets up for a Poet, without attacking the reputation of all his brothers in the art. The ignorance of the moderns, the scribblers of the age, the decay of Poetry, are the topics of of detraction, with which he makes his entrance into the world: But how much more noble is the fame that is built on candour and ingenuity, according to those beautiful lines of Sir John Denham, in his poem on Fletcher's works!

But whether am I stray'd? I need not raise Trophies to thee from other men's dispraise;
Nor is thy fame on lesser ruins built;
Nor needs thy juster title the foul guilt
Of eastern Kings, who to secure their reign
Must have their brothers, sons, and kindred slain.

I am sorry to find that an Author, who is very justly esteemed among the best judges, has admitted some strokes of this nature into a very fine poem, I mean The Art of Criticism, which was published some months since, and is a Matter-piece in its kind. The observations follow one another like those in Horace's Art of Poetry, without that methodical regularity which would have been requisite in a Prose author. They are some of them uncommon, but such as the Reader must attend to, when he sees them explained with that elegance and perspicuity in which they are delivered. As for those which are the most known, and the most received, they are placed in so beautiful a light, and illustrated with such amplifications, that they have in them all the graces of novelty, and make the Reader, who was before acquainted with them, still more convinced of their truth and solidity. And here give me leave to mention what Monsieur Boileau has so very well enlarged upon in the preface to his works, that wit and fine writing doth not consist so much in advancing things that are new, as in giving things that are known an agreeable turn. It is impossible for us, who live in the latter Ages of the world, to make observations in criticism, morality, or in any art or science, which have not been touched upon by others. We have little else left us, but to represent the common sense of mankind in more strong, more beautiful, or more uncommon lights. If a Reader examines Horace's Art of Poetry, he will find but very few precepts in it, which he may meet with in Aristotle, and which were not commonly known by all the Poets of the Augustan Age. His way of expressing and applying them, not his invention of them, is what we are chiefly to admire.

For this reason I think there is nothing in the world so tiresome as the works of those Critics, who write in a positive dogmatic way, without either language, genius or imagination. If the Reader would see how how the best of the Latin Critics writ, he may find their manner very beautifully described in the characters of Horace, Petronius, Quintilian and Longinus, as they are drawn in the Essay of which I am now speaking.

Since I have mentioned Longinus, who in his Reflections has given us the same kind of sublime, which he observes in the several passages that occasioned them; I cannot but take notice, that our English Author has after the same manner exemplified several of his precepts in the very precepts themselves. I shall produce two or three instances of this kind. Speaking of the insipid smoothness which some Readers are so much in love with, he has the following verses:

These equal syllables alone require,
The o'er the ear the open vowels tire,
While expletives their feeble aid do join,
And ten low words oft creep in one dull line.

The gaping of the vowels in the second line, the expletive do in the third, and the ten monosyllables in the fourth, give such beauty to this passage, as would have been very much admired in an ancient Poet. The Reader may observe the following lines in the same view.

A needle's Alexandrine ends the song,
That like a wounded Snake, drags its slow length along.

And afterwards,

Tis not enough no harshness gives offence,
The sound must seem an echo to the sense.
Soft is the strain when Zephyr gently blows,
And the smooth stream in smoother number flows;
But when loud surges bash the sounding shore,
The hoarse, rough verse should like the torrent roar.
When Ajax strives, some rock's vast weight to throw,
The line too labours, and the words move slow:
Not so, when swift Camilla scours the plain,
Flies o'er th' unbending corn, and skims along the main.

The beautiful Ditich upon Ajax in the foregoing lines, puts me in mind of a description in Homer's Odyssey. It is where Sisyphus is represented lifting his stone up the hill, which is no sooner carried to the top of it, but it immediately tumbles to the bottom. This double motion of
of the line is admirably described in the numbers of these verses; as in the four first, it is heaved up by several Spondees intermixed with proper breathing-places, and at last trundles down in a continued line of Dactylics.

It would be endlesly to quote verses out of Virgil which have this particular kind of beauty in the numbers; but I may take an occasion in a future paper to shew several of them which have escaped the observation of others.

I cannot conclude this paper without taking notice, that we have three poems in our tongue, which are of the same nature, and each of them a master-piece in its kind; the Essay on translated verse, the Essay on the art of poetry, and the Essay upon criticism.

Laudis amore tuncs? sunt certe piacula que te Ter pure lecto poterunt recreare libello. Hor.

The Soul, considered abstractedly from its passions, is of a restless and sedentary nature, slow in its resolves, and languishing in its executions. The use therefore of the passions is to stir it up, and put it upon action, to awaken the understanding, to enforce the will, and to make the whole man more vigorous and attentive in the prosecution of his designs. As this is the end of the passions in general, so it is particularly of Ambition, which pushes the soul to such actions as are apt to procure honour and reputation to the Actor. But if we carry our reflections higher, we may discover further ends of Providence in implanting this passion in mankind.
It was necessary for the world, that arts should be invented and improved; books written and transmitted to posterity, nations conquered and civilized: now since the proper and genuine motives to these and the like great actions, would only influence virtuous minds; there would be but small improvements in the world, were there not some common principle of action working equally with all men. And such a principle is Ambition, or a desire of fame, by which great endowments are not suffered to lye idle and useless to the public, and many vicious men over-reached, as it were, and engaged contrary to their natural inclinations in a glorious and laudable course of action. For we may further observe, that men of the greatest abilities are most fired with ambition: and, on the contrary, mean and narrow minds are the least actuated by it; whether it be that a man's sense of his own incapacity makes him despair of coming at fame, or that he has not enough range of thought to look out for any good which does not more immediately relate to his interest or convenience, or that Providence, in the very frame of his soul, would not subject him to such a passion as would be useless to the world, and a torment to himself.

Were not this desire of fame very strong, the difficulty of obtaining it, and the danger of losing it when obtained, would be sufficient to deter a man from so vain a pursuit.

How few are there who are furnished with abilities sufficient to recommend their actions to the admiration of the world, and to distinguish themselves from the rest of mankind? Providence for the most part sets us upon a level, and observes a kind of proportion in its dispensations towards us. If it renders us perfect in one accomplishment, it generally leaves us defective in another, and seems careful rather of preferring every person from being mean and deficient in his qualifications, than of making any single one eminent or extraordinary.

And among those, who are the most richly endowed by nature, and accomplished by their own industry, how few are there whose virtues are not obscured by the ignorance, prejudice or envy of their beholders? Some men cannot discern between a noble and a mean action. Others are apt to attribute them to some false end or intention; and others purposely misrepresent or put a wrong interpretation on them.

But the more to enforce this consideration, we may observe that there are generally most unsuccessful in their pursuit after fame, who are most desirous of obtaining it. It is Sallust's remark upon Catu, that the less he coveted glory, the more he acquired it.
Men take an ill-natured pleasure in crossing our inclinations, and disappointing us in what our hearts are most set upon. When therefore they have discovered the passionate desire of fame in the ambitious man, (as no temper of mind is more apt to shew it self) they become sparing and refered in their commendations, they envy him the satisfaction of an applause, and look on their praises rather as a kindness done to his person, than as a tribute paid to his merit. Others who are free from this natural perversties of temper, grow wary in their praises of one, who sets too great a value on them, lest they should raise him too high in his own imagination, and by consequence remove him to a greater distance from themselves.

But further, this desire of Fame naturally betrays the ambitious man into such indecencies as are a lessening to his reputation. He is still afraid lest any of his actions should be thrown away in private, lest his defects should be concealed from the notice of the world, or receive any disadvantage from the reports which others make of them. This often sets him on empty boasts and ostentations of himself, and betrays him into vain fantastic recitals of his own performances: his discourse generally leans one way, and what ever is the subject of it, tends obliquely either to the detracting from others, or the extolling of himself. Vanity is the natural weakness of an ambitious man, which exposes him to the secret scorn and derision of those he converses with, and ruins the character he is so indolentious to advance by it. For though his actions are never so glorious, they lose their lustre when they are drawn at large, and set to show by his own hands; and as the world is more apt to find fault than to commend, the boast will probably be cenfured when the great action that occasioned it is forgotten.

Besides, this very desire of Fame is looked on as a meanness and an imperfection in the greatest character. A solid and substantial greatness of soul looks down with a generous neglect on the cenitures and applauses of the multitude, and places a man beyond the little noise and strife of tongues. Accordingly we find in our selves a secret awe and veneration for the character of one who moves above us in a regular and illustrious course of virtue, without any regard to our good or ill opinions of him, to our reproaches or commendations. As on the contrary, it is usual for us, when we would take off from the fame and reputation of an action, to ascribe it to vain-glory, and a desire of fame in the actor. Nor is this common judgment and opinion of mankind ill founded: for certainly it denotes no great bravery of mind to be worked up to any noble action.
action by so selfish a motive, and to do that out of a desire of Fame, which we could not be prompted to by a disinterested love to mankind, or by a generous passion for the glory of him that made us.

Thus is Fame a thing difficult to be obtained by all, but particularly by those who thirst after it; since most men have so much either of ill-nature or of vanity, as not to gratify and soothe the vanity of the ambitious man; and since this very thirst after Fame naturally betrays him into such indecencies as are a lessening to his reputation, and is itself looked upon as a weakness in the greatest characters.

In the next place, Fame is easily lost, and as difficult to be preferred as it was at first to be acquired. But this I shall make the subject of a following paper.

Whenever he was asked what he was doing,

He'd say, don't ask such questions.

He.

There are many passions and tempers of mind which naturally dispose us to depress and vilifie the merit of one rising in the esteem of mankind. All those who made their entrance into the world with the same advantages, and were once looked on as his equals, are apt to think the fame of his merits a reflection on their own indecients, and will therefore take care to reproach him with the scandal of some past action, or derogate from the worth of the present, that they may still keep him on the same level with themselves. The like kind of consideration often stirs up the envy of such as were once his superiors, who think it a detract from their merit to see another get ground upon them and overtake them in the pursuits of glory; and will therefore endeavour to sink his reputation, that they may the better preserve their own. Those who were once his equals, envy and detest him, because they now see him their superior; and those who were once his superiors, because they look upon him as their equal.

Vol. III. K

But further, a man whose extraordinary reputation thus lifts him up to the notice and observation of mankind, draws a multitude of eyes upon him that will narrowly inspect every part of him, consider him nicely in all views, and not be a little pleased when they have taken him in the worst and most disadvantageous light. There are many who find a pleasure in contradicting the common reports of fame, and in spreading abroad the weakneces of an exalted character. They publish their ill-natured discoveries with a secret pride, and applaud themselves for the singularity of their judgment which has searched deeper than others, detected what the rest of the world have over-looked, and found a flaw in what the generality of mankind admire. Others there are who proclaim the errors and infirmities of a great man with an inward satisfaction and complacency, if they discover none of the like errors and infirmities in themselves; for while they are exposing another's weakneces, they are tacitly aiming at their own commendations who are not subject to the like infirmities, and are apt to be transported, with a secret kind of vanity, to see themselves superior in some respects to one of a sublime and celebrated reputation. Nay it very often happens, that none are more industrious in publishing the blemishes of an extraordinary reputation, than such as lie open to the same censures in their own characters; as either hoping to excuse their own defects by the authority of so high an example, or raising an imaginary applause to themselves for resembling a person of an exalted reputation, though in the blameable parts of his character. If all these secret springs of detraction fail, yet very often a vain ostentation of wit sets a man on attacking an established name, and sacrificing it to the mirth and laughter of those about him. A satyr or a libel on one of the common lamp, never meets with that reception and approbation among its readers, as what is aimed at a person whose merit places him upon an eminence, and gives him a more conspicuous figure among men. Whether it be that we think it shews greater art to expose and turn to ridicule a man whose character seems so improper a subject for it, or that we are pleased by some implicit kind of revenge to see him taken down and humbled in his reputation, and in some measure reduced to our own rank, who had so far raised himself above us in the reports and opinions of mankind.

Thus we see how many dark and intricate motives there are to detraction and defamation, and how many malicious spies are searching into the actions of a great man, who is not always the best prepared for to narrow an inspection. For we may generally observe, that our admiration ration of a famous man lessens upon our nearer acquaintance with him; and that we seldom hear the description of a celebrated person, without a catalogue of some notorious weaknesses and infirmities. The reason may be, because any little slip is more conspicuous and observable in his conduct than in another's, as it is not of a piece with the rest of his character, or because it is impossible for a man at the same time to be attentive to the more important part of his life, and to keep a watchful eye over all the inconsiderable circumstances of his behaviour and conversation; or because, as we have before observed, the same temper of mind which enchains us to a deference of Fame, naturally betrays us into such slips and unwarinesses as are not incident to men of a contrary disposition.

After all it must be confessed, that a noble and triumphant merit often breaks through and dissipates these little spots and fulfils its reputation; but if by a mistaken pursuit after Fame, or through human infirmity, any false step be made in the more momentous concerns of life, the whole scheme of ambitious desigs is broken and disappointed. The smaller flaws and blemishes may soon be washed away and disappear amidst the brightness that surrounds them; but a blot of a deeper nature casts a shade on all the other beauties, and darkens the whole character. How difficult therefore is it to preserve a great name, when he that has acquired it is so obnoxious to such little weaknesses and infirmities as are no small diminution to it when discovered, especially when they are so industriously proclaimed, and aggravated by such as were once his superiors or equals; by such as would set to show their judgment or their wit; and by such as are guilty or innocent of the same slips or misconducts in their own behaviour.

But were there none of these dispositions in others to censure a famous man, nor any such miscarriages in himself; yet would he meet with no small trouble in keeping up his reputation in all its height and splendour. There must be always a noble train of actions to preserve his Fame in life and motion. For when it is once at a stand, it naturally flaggs and languishes. Admiration is a very short-lived passion, that immediately decays upon growing familiar with its object, unless it be still fed with fresh discoveries, and kept alive by a new perpetual succession of miracles rising up to its view. And even the greatest actions of a celebrated person labour under this disadvantage, that however surprizing and extraordinary they may be, they are no more than what are expected from him; but on the contrary, if they fall any thing below the opinion that is conceived of him, though they might raise the reputation of another, they are a diminution to his.
One would think there should be something wonderfully pleasing in the pursuit of fame, that, notwithstanding all these mortifying considerations, can engage a man in so desperate a pursuit; and yet if we consider the little happiness that attends a great character, and the multitude of dissatisfaction to which the desire of it subjects an ambitious mind, one would be still the more surprized to see so many restless candidates for glory.

Ambition raise a secret tumult in the soul, it inflames the mind, and puts it into a violent hurry of thought; it is still reaching after an empty imaginary good, that has not in it the power to abate or satisifie it. Most other things we long for can allay the craving of their proper sense; and for a while sat the appetite at rest; but fame is a good so wholly foreign to our natures, that we have no faculty in the soul adapted to it, nor any organ in the body to relish it; an object of desire placed out of the possibility of fruition. It may indeed fill the mind for a while with a giddy kind of pleasure, but it is such a pleasure as makes a man restless and uneasie under it; and which does not so much satisifie the present thirst, as it excites fresh desires, and sets the soul on new enterprizes. For how few ambitious men are there, who have got as much fame as they desired, and whose thirst after it has not been as eager in the very height of their reputation, as it was before they became known and eminent among men? There is not any circumstance in Caesar's character which gives me a greater idea of him, than a saying which Cæsar tells us he frequently made use of in private conversation, That he was satisfied with his share of life and fame, Se fatus vel ad naturam, vel ad gloriam vixisse. Many indeed have given over their pursuits after fame, but that has proceeded either from the disappointments they have met in it, or from their experience of the little pleasure which attends it, or from the better informations or natural coldness of old age; but seldom from a full satisfaction and acquiescence in their present enjoyments of it.

Nor is fame only unsatisfying in itself, but the desire of it lays us open to many accidental troubles, which those are free from who have no such tender regard for it. How often is the ambitious man cast down and disappointed, if he receives no praise where he expected it? Nay, how often is he mortified with the very praises he receives, if they do not rise so high as he thinks they ought? which they seldom do, unless encreased by flattery, since few men have so good an opinion of us as we have of our selves. But if the ambitious man can be so much grieved even with praise itself, how will he be able to bear up under scandal and defamation? For the same temper of mind which makes him desire fame, makes him hate reproach. If he can be transported with the extraordinary praises of men, he will be as much dejected by their cenfures. How little therefore is the happiness of an ambitious man, who gives every one a dominion over it, who thus subjects himself to the good or ill speeches of others, and puts it in the power of every malicious tongue to throw him into a fit of melancholy, and destroy his natural rest and repose of mind? Especially when we consider that the world is more apt to cenfure than applaud, and himself fuller of imperfections than virtues.

We may further observe, that such a man will be more grieved for the loss of fame, than he could have been pleased with the enjoyment of it. For though the presence of this imaginary good cannot make us happy, the absence of it may make us miserable; because in the enjoyment of an object we only find that share of pleasure which it is capable of giving us, but in the loss of it we do not proportion our grief to the real value it bears, but to the value our fancies and imaginations set upon it.

So inconsiderable is the satisfaction that fame brings along with it, and so great the disquietudes to which it makes us liable. The desire of it sets up very uneasie motions in the mind, and is rather inflamed than satisfied by the presence of the thing desired. The enjoyment of it brings but very little pleasure, though the loss or want of it be very sensible and afflicting; and even this little happiness is so very precarious, that it wholly depends on the will of others. We are not only tortured by the reproaches which are offered us, but are disappointed by the silence of men when it is unexpected; and humbled even by their praises.
That I might not lose my self upon a subject of so great extent as that of Fame, I have treated it in a particular order and method. I have first of all considered the reasons why Providence may have implanted in our minds such a principle of action. I have in the next place shewn, from many considerations, first, that Fame is a thing difficult to be obtained, and easily lost; Secondly, that it brings the ambitious man very little happiness, but subjects him to much uneasiness and dissatisfaction. I shall in the last place shew, that it hinders us from obtaining an End which we have abilities to acquire, and which is accompanied with fulness of satisfaction. I need not tell my Reader, that I mean by this End, that happiness which is revered for us in another world, which every one has abilities to procure, and which will bring along with it fulness of joy and pleasures for evermore.

How the pursuit after Fame may hinder us in the attainment of this great End, I shall leave the Reader to collect from the three following considerations.

First, Because the strong desire of Fame breeds several vicious habits in the mind.

Secondly, Because many of those actions, which are apt to procure Fame, are not in their nature conducive to this our ultimate happiness.

Thirdly, Because if we should allow the fame actions to be the proper instruments, both of acquiring Fame, and of procuring this happiness, they would nevertheless fail in the attainment of this last end, if they proceeded from a desire of the first.

These three propositions are self-evident to those who are versed in Speculations of morality. For which reason I shall not enlarge upon them, but proceed to a point of the same nature, which may open to us a more uncommon field of Speculation.

From
From what has been already observed, I think we may make a natural conclusion, that it is the greatest folly to seek the praise or approbation of any Being, besides the supremum, and that for these two reasons. Because no other Being can make a right judgment of us, and esteem us according to our merits; and because we can procure no considerable benefit or advantage from the esteem and approbation of any other Being.

In the first place, no other Being can make a right judgment of us, and esteem us according to our merits. Created Beings see nothing but our outside, and can therefore only frame a judgment of us from our exterior actions and behaviour; but how unwise these are to give us a right notion of each other's perfections, may appear from several considerations. There are many virtues, which in their own nature are incapable of any outward representation: many silent perfections in the soul of a good man, which are great ornaments to humane nature, but not able to discover themselves to the knowledge of others; they are transfixed in private, without noise or show, and are only visible to the great Searcher of hearts. What actions can express the entire purity of thought which renews and sanctifies a virtuous man? That secret rest and contentedness of mind, which gives him a perfect enjoyment of his present condition? That inward pleasure and complacency, which he feels in doing good? That delight and satisfaction which he takes in the prosperity and happiness of another? These and the like virtues are the hidden beauties of a soul, the secret graces which cannot be discovered by a mortal eye, but make the soul lovely and precious in his sight, from whom no secrets are concealed. Again, there are many virtues which want an opportunity of exerting and shewing themselves in actions. Every virtue requires time and place, a proper object and a fit conjunction of circumstances, for the due exercise of it. A state of poverty obscurcs all the virtues of liberality and munificence. The patience and fortitude of a Martyr or Confessor are concealed in the flourishing times of Christianity. Some virtues are only seen in affliction, and some in prosperity; some in a private, and others in a publick capacity. But the great Sovereign of the world beholds every perfection in its obscurity, and not only sees what we do, but what we would do. He views our behaviour in every concurrence of affairs, and sees us engaged in all the possibilities of action. He discovers the Martyr and Confessor without the trial of flames and tortures, and will hereafter entitle many to the reward of actions, which they had never the opportunity of performing. Another reason why men cannot form a right judgment of us, because the same actions may be aimed at different ends, and arise from quite contrary principles. Actions are of so mixt a nature, and so full of circumstances, that as men pry into them more or less, or observe some parts more than others, they take different hints, and put contrary interpretations on them; so that the same actions may represent a man as hypocritical and designing to one, which make him appear a Saint or Hero to another. He therefore who looks upon the soul through its outward actions, often sees it through a deceitful medium, which is apt to discolour and pervert the object; so that on this account also, he is the only proper judge of our perfections, who does not guess at the sincerity of our intentions from the goodness of our actions; but weighs the goodness of our actions by the sincerity of our intentions.

But further; it is impossible for outward actions to represent the perfections of the soul, because they can never shew the strength of those principles from whence they proceed. They are not adequate expressions of our virtues, and cannot shew us what habits are in the soul, without discovering the degree and perfection of such habits. They are at best but weak resemblances of our intentions, faint and imperfect copies that may acquaint us with the general design, but can never express the beauty and life of the original. But the great Judge of all the earth knows every different state and degree of humane improvement, from those weak stirrings and tendencies of the Will which have not yet formed themselves into regular purposes and designs, to the last entire firmness and consummation of a good habit. He beholds the first imperfect rudiments of a virtue in the soul, and keeps a watchful eye over it in all its progress, until it has received every grace it is capable of, and appears in its full beauty and perfection. Thus we see that none but the supreme Being can esteem us according to our proper merits, since all others must judge of us from our outward actions, which can never give them a just estimate of us, since there are many perfections of a man which are not capable of appearing in actions; many which, allowing no natural incapacity of shewing themselves, want an opportunity of doing it; or should they all meet with an opportunity of appearing by actions, yet those actions may be misinterpreted, and applied to wrong principles; or though they plainly discovered the principles from whence they proceeded, they could never shew the degree, strength and perfection of those principles.

And
And as the supreme Being is the only proper Judge of our perfections, so is he the only fit Rewarder of them. This is a consideration that comes home to our interest, as the other adapts itself to our ambition. And what could the most aspiring, or the most selfish man desire more, were he to form the notion of a Being to whom he would recommend himself, than such a knowledge as can discover the least appearance of perfection in him, and such a goodness as will proportion a reward to it?

Let the ambitious man therefore turn all his desire of Fame this way; and, that he may propose to himself a Fame worthy of his ambition, let him consider that if he employs his abilities to the best advantage, the time will come when the supreme Governor of the world, the great Judge of mankind, who sees every degree of perfection in others, and possesses all possible perfection in himself, shall proclaim his worth before men and angels, and pronounce to him in the presence of the whole creation that best and most significant of applause, Well done thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into thy Master's joy.

No 261. Saturday, December 29.

My Father, whom I mentioned in my first Speculation, and whom I must always name with honour and gratitude, has very frequently talked to me upon the subject of Marriage. I was in my younger years engaged, partly by his advice, and partly by my own inclinations, in the courtship of a person who had a great deal of beauty, and did not at my first approaches seem to have any aversion to me; but as my natural taciturnity hindered me from showing myself to the best advantage, she by degrees began to look upon me as a very fitly fellow, and being resolved to regard Merit more than any thing else in the persons who made their applications to her, she married a Captain of Dragoons who happened to be beating up for recruits in those parts.
This unlucky accident has given me an aversion to pretty fellows ever since, and discouraged me from trying my fortune with the fair sex. The observations which I made in this juncture, and the repeated advices which I received at that time from the good man above-mentioned, have produced the following Essay upon Love and Marriage.

The pleasantest part of a man's life is generally that which passes in courtship, provided his passion be sincere, and the party beloved kind with discretion. Love, Desire, Hope, all the pleasing motions of the soul rise in the pursuit.

It is easier for an artful man, who is not in love, to persuade his mistress he has a passion for her, and to succeed in his pursuits, than for one who loves with the greatest violence. True love hath ten thousand griefs, impatiences and resentments, that render a man unamiable in the eyes of the person whose affection he solicits; besides, that it sinks his figure, gives him fears, apprehensions and poorness of spirit, and often makes him appear ridiculous where he has a mind to recommend himself.

Those marriages generally abound most with love and constancy, that are preceded by a long courtship. The passion should strike root, and gather strength before marriage be grafted on it. A long course of hopes and expectations fixes the idea in our minds, and habituates us to a fondness of the person beloved.

There is nothing of so great importance to us, as the good qualities of one to whom we join our selves for life; they do not only make our present state agreeable, but often determine our happiness for all eternity. Where the choice is left to friends, the chief point under consideration is an Estate: where the parties chuse for themselves, their thoughts turn most upon the Person. They have both their reasons. The first would procure many conveniences and pleasures of life to the party whose interests they espouse; and at the same time may hope that the wealth of their friend will turn to their own credit and advantage. The others are preparing for themselves a perpetual feast. A good person does not only raise, but continue love, and breeds a secret pleasure and complacency in the beholder, when the first heats of desire are extinguished. It puts the wife or husband in countenance both among friends and strangers, and generally fills the family with a healthy and beautiful race of children.

I should prefer a woman that is agreeable in my own eye, and not deformed in that of the world, to a celebrated beauty. If you marry one remarkably remarkably beautiful, you must have a violent passion for her, or you have not the proper taste of her charms; and if you have such a passion for her, it is odds but it will be imibittered with fears and jealousies.

Good-nature, and evenness of temper, will give you an easy companion for life; virtue and good sense, an agreeable friend; love and confiency, a good wife or husband. Where we meet one person with all these accomplishments, we find an hundred without any one of them. The world, notwithstanding, is more intent on trains and equipages, and all the showy parts of life; we love rather to dazzle the multitude, than consult our proper interest; and, as I have elsewhere observed, it is one of the most unaccountable passions of humane nature, that we are at greater pains to appear easy and happy to others, than really to make our selves so. Of all disparities, that in humour makes the most unhappy marriages, yet scarce enters into our thoughts at the contracting of them. Several that are in this respect unequally weighed, and uncease for life, with a person of a particular character, might have been pleased and happy with a person of a contrary one; notwithstanding they are both perhaps equally virtuous and laudable in their kind.

Before marriage we cannot be too inquisitive and discerning in the faults of the person beloved, nor after it too dim-sighted and superficial. However perfect and accomplished the person appears to you at a distance, you will find many blemishes and imperfections in her humour, upon a more intimate acquaintance, which you never discovered or perhaps suspected. Here therefore discretion and good-nature are to show their strength; the first will hinder your thoughts from dwelling on what is disagreeable, the other will raise in you all the tenderness of compassion and humanity, and by degrees soften those very imperfections into beauties.

Marriage enlarges the scene of our happiness and miseries. A marriage of love is pleasant; a marriage of interest easy; and a marriage, where both meet, happy. A happy marriage has in it all the pleasures of friendship, all the enjoyments of sense and reason, and indeed, all the sweets of life. Nothing is a greater mark of a degenerate and vicious Age, than the common ridicule which passes on this state of life. It is indeed, only happy in those who can look down with scorn or neglect on the impieties of the times, and tread the paths of life together in a constant uniform course of virtue.
Think my self highly obliged to the public for their kind acceptance of a paper which visits them every morning, and has in it none of those Seasonings that recommend so many of the writings which are in vogue among us.

As, on the one side, my paper has not in it a single word of news, a reflection in politics, nor a stroke of party; so, on the other, there are no fashionable touches of infidelity, no oblique ideas, no satyrs upon priesthood, marriage, and the like popular topics of ridicule; no private scandal, nor any thing that may tend to the defamation of particular persons, families, or societies.

There is not one of these above-mentioned subjects that would not sell a very indifferent paper, could I think of gratifying the public by such mean and base methods: but notwithstanding I have rejected every thing that favours of party, every thing that is loose and immoral, and every thing that might create uneasiness in the minds of particular persons, I find that the demand of my papers has increased every month since their first appearance in the world. This does not perhaps reflect so much honour upon my self, as on my Readers, who give a much greater attention to discourses of virtue and morality, than ever I expected, or indeed could hope.

When I broke loose from that great body of writers who have employed their wit and parts in propagating of vice and irreligion, I did not question but I should be treated as an odd kind of fellow that had a mind to appear singular in my way of writing; but the general reception I have found, convinces me that the world is not so corrupt as we are apt to imagine; and that if those men of parts who have been employed in vitiating the Age, had endeavoured to rectifie and amend it, they needed not have sacrificed their good sense and virtue to their fame and reputation. No man is so sunk in vice and ignorance, but there are still some hidden seeds of goodness and knowledge in him; which give him a relish of such reflections and speculations as have an aptness to improve the mind, and to make the heart better.

I have shown in a former paper, with how much care I have avoided all such thoughts as are loose, obscene, or immoral; and I believe my Reader would still think the better of me, if he knew the pains I am at in qualifying what I write after such a manner, that nothing may be interpreted as aimed at private persons. For this reason when I draw any faulty character, I consider all those persons to whom the malice of the world may possibly apply it, and take care to dash it with such particular circumstances as may prevent all such ill-natured applications. If I write any thing on a black man, I run over in my mind all the eminent persons in the nation who are of that complexion: when I place an imaginary name at the head of a character, I examine every syllable and letter of it, that it may not bear any resemblance to one that is real. I know very well the value which every man sets upon his reputation, and how painful it is to be expos’d to the mirth and derision of the publick, and should therefore scorn to divert my Reader at the expense of any private man.

As I have been thus tender of every particular person’s reputation, so I have taken more than ordinary care not to give offence to those who appear in the higher figures of life. I would not make my self merry even with a piece of papist board that is invested with a publick character; for which reason I have never glanced upon the late designed procession of his Holiness and his attendants, notwithstanding it might have afforded matter to many ludicrous Speculations. Among those advantages, which the publick may reap from this paper, it is not the least, that it draws men’s minds off from the bitterness of party, and furnishes them with subjects of discourse that may be treated without warmth or passion. This is said to have been the first design of those Gentlemen who set foot on the Royal Society; and had then a very good effect, as it turned many of the greatest genius’s of that age to the disquisitions of natural knowledge, who, if they had engaged in politics, with the same parts and application, might have set their country in a flame. The Air-pump, the Barometer, the Quadrant, and the like inventions, were thrown out to those brave spirits, as tubs and barrels are to a whale, that he may let the ship sail on without disturbance, while he diverts himself with those innocent amusements.
I have been so very scrupulous in this particular of not hurting any man's reputation, that I have forborne mentioning even such Authors as I could not name with honour. This I must confess to have been a piece of very great self-denial: for as the public relishes nothing better than the ridicule which turns upon a writer of any eminence, so there is nothing which a man that has but a very ordinary talent in ridicule may execute with greater ease. One might raile laughter for a quarter of a year together upon the works of a person who has published but a very few volumes. For which reason I am astonished, that those who have appeared against this paper have made so very little of it. The criticisms which I have hitherto published, have been made with an intention rather to discover beauties and excellencies in the writers of my own time, than to publish any of their faults and imperfections. In the meantime I should take it for a very great favour from some of my under-hand detractors, if they would break all measures with me so far, as to give me a pretence for examining their performances with an impartial eye: nor shall I look upon it as a breach of charity to criticize the Author, so long as I keep clear of the Person.

In the meantime, till I am provoked to such hostilities, I shall from time to time endeavour to do justice to those who have distinguished themselves in the politer parts of learning, and to point out such beauties in their works as may have escaped the observation of others.

As the first place among our English Poets is due to Milton; and as I have drawn more quotations out of him than from any other, I shall enter into a regular criticism upon his Paradise Lost, which I shall publish every Saturday, till I have given my thoughts upon that Poem. I shall not however presume to impose upon others my own particular judgment on this Author, but only deliver it as my private opinion. Criticism is of a large extent, and every particular matter in this art has his favourite passages in an Author, which do not equally strike the best judges. It will be sufficient for me if I discover many beauties or imperfections which others have not attended to, and I should be very glad to see any of our eminent writers publish their discoveries on the same subject. In short, I would always be understood to write my papers of criticism in the spirit which Horace has expressed in those two famous lines:

--- Si quid nostris retinues eis,
Candidus impetrís f non, his utere mecum.---

If you have made any better remarks of your own, communicate them with candour; if not, make use of these I present you with.
ONE of the Fathers, if I am rightly informed, has defined a woman to be χριστόι φιλοξενοῦσαι, an animal that delights in finery. I have already treated of the sex in two or three papers, conformably to this definition, and have in particular observed, that in all ages they have been more careful than the men to adorn that part of the head, which we generally call the outside.

This observation is so very notorious, that when in ordinary discourse we say a man has a fine head, a long head, or a good head, we express our selves metaphorically, and speak in relation to his understanding; whereas when we say of a woman, she has a fine, a long or a good head, we speak only in relation to her commode.

It is observed among birds, that nature has lavished all her ornaments upon the male, who very often appears in a most beautiful head-dress: whether it be a crest, a comb, a tuft of feathers, or a natural little plume, erected like a kind of pinnacle on the very top of the head. As nature on the contrary has poured out her charms in the greatest abundance upon the female part of our species, so they are very affidious in bestowing upon themselves the finest garnitures of art. The peacock, in all his pride, does not display half the colours that appear in the garments of a British Lady, when she is drested either for a ball or a birthday.

But to return to our female heads. The Ladies have been for some time in a kind of moulting season, with regard to that part of their dress, having cast great quantities of ribbon, lace, and cambrick, and in some measure reduced that part of the humane figure to the beautiful globular form, which is natural to it. We have for a great while expected what kind of ornament would be substitutted in the place of those antiquated commodes. But our female projectors were all the last summer so taken up up with the improvement of their petticoats, that they had not time to attend to any thing else; but having at length sufficiently adorned their lower parts, they now begin to turn their thoughts upon the other extremity, as well remembering the old kitchin proverb, that if you light a fire at both ends, the middle will shift for its self.

I am engaged in this Speculation by a sight which I lately met with at the Opera. As I was standing in the hinder part of the box, I took notice of a little cluster of women sitting together in the prettiest coloured hoods that I ever saw. One of them was blue, another yellow, and another philmot; the fourth was of a pink colour, and the fifth of a pale green. I looked with as much pleasure upon this little party-coloured assemblage, as upon a bed of tulips, and did not know at first whether it might not be an embassage of Indian Queens; but upon my going about the pit, and taking them in front, I was immediately undeceived, and saw much beauty in every face, that I found them all to be English.
Such eyes and lips, cheeks and foreheads, could be the growth of no other country. The complexion of their faces hindered me from observing any further the colour of their hoods, though I could easily perceive by that unspeakable satisfaction which appeared in their looks, that their own thoughts were wholly taken up on those pretty ornaments they wore upon their heads.

I am informed that this fashion spreads daily, inasmuch that the Whig and Tory Ladies begin already to hang out different colours, and to shew their principles in their head-dress. Nay if I may believe my friend Will Honeycomb, there is a certain old Coquette of his acquaintance, who intends to appear very suddenly in a rainbow hood, like the Iris in Dryden's Virgil, not questioning but that among such a variety of colours she shall have a charm for every heart.

My friend Will, who very much values himself upon his great in-fights into gallantry, tells me, that he can already guess at the humour a Lady is in by her hood, as the courtiers of Morocco know the disposition of their present Emperor by the colour of the dres which he puts on. When Meleusinda wraps her head in flame colour, her heart is set upon execution. When she covers it with purple, I would not, says he, advise her lover to approach her; but if she appears in white, it is peace, and he may hand her out of her box with safety.

Will informs me likewise, that these hoods may be used as signals.
Why else, says he, does Cornelia always put on a black hood when her husband is gone into the country?

Such
Such are my friend Honeycomb's dreams of gallantry. For my own part, I impute this diversity of colours in the hoods to the diversity of complexion in the faces of my pretty country women. Ovid in his Art of Love has given some precepts as to this particular, though I find they are different from those which prevail among the moderns. He recommends a red striped silk to the pale complexion; white to the brown, and dark to the fair. On the contrary my friend Will, who pretends to be a greater master in this art than Ovid, tells me, that the palest features look the most agreeable in white farcenet; that a face which is overflushed appears to advantage in the deepest scarlet, and that the darkest complexion is not a little alleviated by a black hood. In short, he is for losing the colour of the face in that of the hood, as a fire burns dimly, and a candle goes half out, in the light of the Sun. This, says he, your Ovid himself has hinted, where he treats of these matters, when he tells us that the blue Water-nymphs are dreselfed in Sky-coloured garments; and that Aurora, who always appears in the light of the rising Sun, is robed in saffron.

Whether these his observations are justly grounded I cannot tell; but I have often known him, as we have stood together behind the Ladies, praise or dispraise the complexion of a face which he never saw, from observing the colour of her hood, and has been very seldom out in these his guesses.

As I have nothing more at heart than the honour and improvement of the fair sex, I cannot conclude this paper without an exhortation to the British Ladies, that they would excel the women of all other nations as much in virtue and good sense, as they do in beauty; which they may certainly do, if they will be as industrious to cultivate their minds, as they are to adorn their bodies; in the mean while I shall recommend to them most serious consideration the saying of an old Greek Poet,

Γεωργικὸς ἡμερος, τέλος, εστί χρειστα.
THERE is nothing in nature more irksome than general discourses, especially when they turn chiefly upon words. For this reason I shall waive the discussion of that point which was started some years since, Whether Milton’s Paradise Lost may be called an Heroic Poem? Those who will not give it that title, may call it (if they please) a Divine Poem. It will be sufficient to its perfection, if it has in it all the beauties of the highest kind of poetry; and as for those who allege it is not an Heroic Poem, they advance no more to the diminution of it, than if they should say Adam is not Aeneas, nor Eve Helen.

I shall therefore examine it by the rules of Epic poetry, and see whether it falls short of the Iliad or Aeneid, in the beauties which are essential to that kind of writing. The first thing to be considered in an Epic poem, is the Fable, which is perfect or imperfect, according as the action which it relates is more or less so. This action should have three qualifications in it. First, it should be but One action. Secondly, it should be an Entire action; and Thirdly, it should be a Great action. To consider the action of the Iliad, Aeneid, and Paradise Lost, in these three several lights. Homer, to preserve the Unity of his action, hastens into the midst of things, as Horace has observed: had he gone up to Leda’s egg, or begun much later, even at the rape of Helen, or the investing of Troy, it is manifest that the story of the poem would have been a series of several actions. He therefore opens his poem with the discourse of his Princes, and artfully interweaves, in the several succeeding parts of it, an account of every thing material which relates to them, and had passed before this fatal diffusion. After the same manner Aeneas makes his first appearance in the Tauricene seas, and within sight of Italy, because the action propounded to be celebrated was that of his settling himself in Latium. But because it was necessary for the reader to know what had happened to him in the taking of Troy, and in the preceding parts of his his voyage, Virgil makes his Heroe relate it by way of Episode in the second and third books of the Aeneid. The contents of both which books come before those of the first book in the thread of the story, though for preferring of this Unity of action, they follow it in the disposition of the poem. Milton, in imitation of these two great Poets, opens his Paradise Lost with an infernal council plotting the Fall of man, which is the action he proposed to celebrate; and as for those great actions, the battle of the angels, and the creation of the world, (which preceded in point of time, and which, in my opinion, would have entirely destroyed the Unity of his principal action, had he related them in the same order that they happened) he calleth them into the fifth, sixth and seventh books, by way of Episode to this noble poem.

Aristotle himself allowed, that Homer has nothing to boast of as to the Unity of his Fable, though at the same time that great Critic and Philosopher endeavours to palliate this imperfection in the Greek Poet, by imputing it to some measure to the very nature of an Epic Poem. Some have been of opinion, that the Aeneid also labours in this particular, and has Episodes which may be looked upon as excrescencies rather than as parts of the action. On the contrary, the Poem which we have now under our consideration, hath no other Episodes than such as naturally arise from the subject, and yet is filled with such a multitude of astonishing incidents, that it gives us at the same time a pleasure of the greatest variety, and of the greatest simplicity; uniform in its nature, though diversified in the execution.

I must observe also, that as Virgil in the poem which was designed to celebrate the original of the Roman empire, has described the birth of its great rival, the Carthaginian Commonwealth: Milton with the like art in his poem on the Fall of man, has related the Fall of those angels who are his professed enemies. Beside the many other beauties in such an Episode, its running parallel with the great action of the poem, hinders it from breaking the Unity so much as another Episode would have done, that had not so great an affinity with the principal subject. In short, this is the same kind of beauty which the Critics admire in the Spanish Fryar, or the Double Discovery, where the two different plots look like counterparts and copies of one another.

The second qualification required in the action of an Epic Poem is, that it should be an entire action: an action is entire when it is compleat in all its parts; or as Aristotle describes it, when it consists of a beginning, a middle, and an end. Nothing should go before it, be intermixed with it, or follow after it, that is not related to it. As on the contrary, no single step should be omitted in that just and regular process which it must be supposed to take from its original to its consummation. Thus we see the anger of Achilles in its birth, its continuance and effects; and Aeneas's settlement in Italy, carried on through all the oppositions in his way to it both by sea and land. The action in Milton excels (I think) both the former in this particular; we see it contrived in hell, executed upon earth, and punished by heaven. The parts of it are told in the most distinct manner, and grow out of one another in the most natural order.

The third qualification of an Epic poem is its Greatness. The anger of Achilles was of such consequence, that it embroiled the Kings of Greece, destroyed the Heroes of Asia, and engaged all the Gods in factions. The settlement of Aeneas in Italy produced the Cæsars, and gave birth to the Roman empire. Milton's subject was still greater than either of the former; it does not determine the fate of single persons or nations, but of a whole species. The united powers of hell are joined together for the destruction of mankind, which they effected in part, and would have completed, had not Omnipotence itself interposed. The principal actors are man in his greatest perfection, and woman in her highest beauty. Their enemies are the fallen angels: the Messiah their friend, and the Almighty their protector. In short, every thing that is great in the whole circle of Being, whether within the verge of nature, or out of it, has a proper part assigned in this admirable poem.

In poetry, as in architecture, not only the whole, but the principal members, and every part of them, should be Great. I will not presume to say, that the book of Games in the Æneid, or that in the Iliad, are not of this nature, nor to reprehend Virgil's simile of a Top, and many other of the same kind in the Iliad, as liable to any cenüre in this particular; but I think we may say, without derogating from those wonderful performances, that there is an indubitable and unquestioned magnificence in every part of Paradise Lost, and indeed a much greater than could have been formed upon any pagan system.

But Aristotle, by the Greatness of the action, does not only mean that it should be great in its Nature, but also in its Duration, or in other words, that it should have a due Length in it, as well as what we properly call Greatness. The just measure of this kind of magnitude, he explains by the following limitation. An animal, no bigger than a Mite, cannot appear perfect to the eye, because the fight takes it in at once, and has only only a confused idea of the whole, and not a distinct idea of all its parts; if on the contrary, you should suppose an animal of ten thousand furlongs in length, the eye would be so filled with a single part of it, that it could not give the mind an idea of the whole. What these animals are to the eye, a very short or a very long action would be to the memory. The first would be, as it were, lost and swallowed up by it, and the other difficult to be contained in it. Homer and Virgil have shown their principal art in this particular; the action of the Iliad, and that of the Æneid, were in themselves exceeding short, but are so beautifully extended and diversified by the invention of Epistles, and the machinery of gods, with the like poetical ornaments, that they make up an agreeable story sufficient to employ the memory without overcharging it. Milton's action is enriched with such variety of circumstances, that I have taken as much pleasure in reading the Contents of his books, as is the best invented story I ever met with. It is possible, that the traditions on which the Iliad and Æneid were built, had more circumstances in them than the history of the Fall of Man, as it is related in Scripture. Besides it was easier for Homer and Virgil to dash the truth with fiction, as they were in no danger of offending the religion of their country by it. But as for Milton, he had not only a very few circumstances upon which to raise his poem, but was also obliged to proceed with the greatest caution in every thing that he added out of his own invention. And, indeed, notwithstanding all the restraints he was under, he has filled his story with so many surprizing incidents, which bear so close an analogy with what is delivered in holy writ, that it is capable of pleasing the most delicate reader, without giving offence to the most scrupulous.

The modern Critics have collected, from several hints in the Iliad and Æneid, the space of time which is taken up by the action of each of those poems; but as a great part of Milton's story was transferred in regions that lie out of the reach of the Sun and the sphere of day, it is impossible to gratify the Reader with such a calculation, which indeed would be more curious than instructive; none of the Critics, either ancient or modern, having laid down rules to circumscribe the action of an Epic poem with any determined number of years, days or hours.

* But of this more particularly hereafter.

Saturday,
HAVING examined the Action of Paradise Lost, let us in the next place consider the Actors. This is Aristotle's method of considering, first the fable, and secondly the manners; or, as we generally call them in English, the fable and the characters.

Homer has excelled all the Heroic Poets that ever wrote, in the Multitude and Variety of his characters. Every God that is admitted into his Poem, acts a part which would have been suitable to no other Deity. His Princes are as much distinguished by their manners as by their dominions; and even those among them, whose characters seem wholly made up of courage, differ from one another as to the particular kinds of courage in which they excel. In short, there is scarce a speech or action in Iliad, which the reader may not ascribe to the person that speaks or acts, without seeing his name at the head of it.

Homer does not only out-shine all other Poets in the Variety, but also in the Novelty of his characters. He hath introduced among his Grecian Princes a person who had lived twice the age of man, and conversed with Thebes, Hercules, Polyphemus, and the first race of Heroes. His principal actor is the son of a Goddes, not to mention the Off-spring of other deities, who have likewise a place in his Poem, and the venerable Trojan Prince, who was the father of so many Kings and Heroes. There is in these several characters of Homer, a certain Dignity as well as Novelty, which adapts them in a more peculiar manner to the nature of an heroic poem. Though at the same time, to give them the greater Variety, he has described a Vulcan, that is a buffoon among his Gods, and a Thersites among his mortals.

Virgil falls infinitely short of Homer in the Characters of his Poem, both as to their Variety and Novelty. Aeneas is indeed a perfect character, but as for Achates, though he is filled the Hero's friend, he does nothing in the whole poem which may deserve that title. Gus, Muesbeus, Sergius,.
geffus and Cloanthus, are all of them men of the same stamp and character,

---fortemque Gyan, fortimque Cloanthum: Virg.

There are indeed several natural incidents in the part of Aeneas; as that of Dido cannot be sufficiently admired. I do not see any thing new or particular in Tityus. Pallas and Evander are remote copies of Hector and Priam, as Lausus and Mezentius are almost parallels to Pallas and Evander. The characters of Nisus and Euryalus are beautiful, but common. We must not forget the parts of Simon, Camilla, and some few others, which are fine improvements on the Greek Poet. In short, there is neither that Variety nor Novelty in the persons of the Aeneid, which we meet with in those of the Iliad.

If we look into the Characters of Milton, we shall find that he has introduced all the Variety his fable was capable of receiving. The whole species of mankind was in two persons at the time to which the subject of his Poem is confined. We have, however, four distinct characters in these two persons. We see man and woman in the highest innocence and perfection, and in the most abject state of guilt and infirmity. The two last characters are, indeed, very common and obvious, but the two first are not only more Magnificent, but more New than any characters either in Virgil or Homer, or indeed in the whole circle of nature.

Milton was so sensible of this defect in the subject of his Poem, and of the few Characters it would afford him, that he has brought into it two actors of a shadowy fictitious nature, in the persons of Sin and Death, by which means he has wrought into the body of his fable a very beautiful and well-invented Allegory. But notwithstanding the fineness of this Allegory may atone for it in some measure; I cannot think that such personages of such a chimerical existence are proper actors in an Epic Poem; because there is not that measure of probability annexed to them, which is requisite in writings of this kind, as I shall shew more at large hereafter.

Virgil has, indeed, admitted Fame as an actress in the Aeneid, but the part the acts is very short, and none of the most admired circumstances in that divine work. We find in Mock-heroic poems, particularly in the Dispenetary and the Lutrin, several allegorical personages of this nature, which are very beautiful in those compositions, and may, perhaps, be used as an argument, that the authors of them were of opinion, such characters might have a place in an Epic work. For my own part, I should be.
be glad the reader would think so; for the sake of the Poem I am now examining; and must further add, that if such empty, unsubstantial beings may be ever made use of on this occasion, never were any more nicely imagined, and employed in more proper actions, than those of which I am now speaking.

Another principal actor in this poem is the great enemy of mankind. The part of Ulysses in Homer's Odyssey is very much admired by Aristotle, as perplexing that fable with very agreeable plots and intricacies, not only by the many adventures in his voyage, and the subtlety of his behaviour, but by the various concealments and discoveries of his person in several parts of that Poem. But the crafty Being I have now mentioned makes a much longer voyage than Ulysses, puts in practice many more wiles and stratagems, and hides himself under a greater variety of shapes and appearances, all of which are severally detected, to the great delight and surprize of the reader.

We may likewise observe with how much art the Poet has varied several characters of the persons that speak in his infernal assembly. On the contrary, how has he represented the whole Godhead exerting itself towards man in its full benevolence under the threefold distinction of a Creator, a Redeemer, and a Comforter?

Nor must we omit the person of Raphael, who, amidst his tenderness and friendship for man, shews such a dignity and consideration in all his speech and behaviour, as are suitable to a superior nature. The Angels are indeed as much diversified in Milton, and distinguished by their proper parts, as the Gods are in Homer or Virgil. The reader will find nothing ascribed to Uriel, Gabriel, Michael, or Raphael, which is not in a particular manner suitable to their respective characters.

There is another circumstance in the principal actors of the Iliad and Aeneid, which gives a peculiar beauty to those two Poems, and was therefore contrived with very great judgment. I mean the authors having chosen for their Heroes persons who were so nearly related to the people for whom they wrote. Achilles was a Greek, and Aeneas the remote founder of Rome. By this means their countrymen (whom they principally proposed to themselves for their readers) were particularly attentive to all the parts of their story, and sympathized with their Heroes in all their adventures. A Roman could not but rejoice in the escapes, successes, and victories of Aeneas, and be grieved at any defeats, misfortunes, or disappointments that befell him; as a Greek must have had the same regard for Achilles. And it is plain, that each of those poems have have lost this great advantage, among those readers to whom their Heroes are as strangers, or indifferent persons.

Milton's Poem is admirable in this respect, since it is impossible for any of its readers, whatever nation, country or people he may belong to, not to be related to the persons who are the principal actors in it; but what is still infinitely more to its advantage, the principal actors in this poem are not only our progenitors, but our representatives. We have an actual interest in everything they do, and no less than our utmost happiness is concerned, and lies at stake in their behaviour.

I shall subjoin as a corollary to the foregoing remark, an admirable observation out of Aristotle, which hath been very much misrepresented in the quotations of some modern Critics. "If a man of perfect and consummate virtue falls into a misfortune, it raises our pity, but not our terror, because we do not fear that it may be our own case, who do not resemble the suffering person. But as that great Philosopher adds, if we see a man of virtue, mixt with infirmities, fall into any misfortune, it does not only raise our pity, but our terror; because we are afraid that the like misfortune may happen to our selves, who resemble the character of the suffering person.

I shall only remark in this place, that the foregoing observation of Aristotle, though it may be true in other occasions, does not hold in this; because in the present case, though the persons who fall into misfortune are of the most perfect and consummate virtue, it is not to be considered as what may possibly be, but what actually is our own case; since we are embarked with them on the same bottom, and must be partakers of their happiness or misery.

In this, and some other very few instances, Aristotle's rules for Epic poetry (which he had drawn from his reflections upon Homer) cannot be supposed to square exactly with the Heroic poems which have been made since his time; since it is evident to every impartial Judge his rules would still have been more perfect, could he have perused the Aeneid which was made some hundred years after his death.

In my next, I shall go through other parts of Milton's Poem; and hope that what I shall there advance, as well as what I have already written, will not only serve as a comment upon Milton, but upon Aristotle.
We have already taken a general survey of the Fable and Characters in Milton's "Paradise Lost"; the parts which remain to be considered, according to Aristotle's method, are the Sentiments; and the Language. Before I enter upon the first of these, I must advert to my Reader, that it is my design, as soon as I have finished my general reflections on these four several heads, to give particular instances out of the Poem, now before us, of Beauties and Imperfections which may be observed under each of them, as also of such other particulars as may not properly fall under any of them. This I thought fit to premise, that the Reader may not judge too hastily of this piece of criticism, or look upon it as imperfect, before he has seen the whole extent of it.

The Sentiments in an Epic Poem are the Thoughts and Behaviour which the Author ascribes to the persons whom he introduces, and are just when they are conformable to the characters of the several persons. The Sentiments have likewise a relation to things as well as persons, and are then perfect when they are such as are adapted to the subject. If in either of these cases the Poet endeavours to argue or explain, magnifie or diminish, to ralie love or hatred, pity or terror, or any other passion, we ought to consider whether the Sentiments he makes use of are proper for those ends. Homer is cenfur'd by the Critics for his defect as to this particular in several parts of the "Iliad" and "Odyssey," though at the same time those who have treated this great Poet with candour, have attributed this defect to the times in which he lived. It was the fault of the age, and not of Homer, if there wants that delicacy in some of his sentiments, which now appears in the works of men of a much inferior genius. Besides, if there are blemishes in any particular thoughts, there is an infinite beauty in the greatest part of them. In short, if there are many Poets who would not have fallen into the meaner of some of his sentiments, there are none who could have risen up to the greatness of others. Virgil has excelled all others in the propriety of his sentiments. Milton shines likewise very much in this particular: nor must we omit one consideration which adds to his honour and reputation. Homer and Virgil introduced persons whose characters are commonly known among men, and such as are to be met with either in history, or in ordinary conversation. Milton's characters, most of them, lie out of nature, and were to be formed purely by his own invention. It shows a greater genius in Shakespeare to have drawn his Caliban, than his Hotspur or Julius Cæsar: the one was to be supplied out of his own imagination, whereas the other might have been formed upon tradition, history, and observation. It was much easier therefore for Homer to find proper sentiments for an assembly of Grecian Generals, than for Milton to diversify his infernal council with proper characters, and inspire them with a variety of sentiments. The loves of Dido and Aeneas are only copies of what has passed between other persons. Adam and Eve before the fall are a different species from those of mankind, who are descended from them; and none but a Poet of the most unbounded invention, and the most exquisite judgment, could have filled their conversation and behaviour with so many circumstances during their state of innocence.

Nor is it sufficient for an Epic Poem to be filled with such thoughts as are natural, unless it abound also with such as are sublime. Virgil in this particular falls short of Homer. He has not indeed so many thoughts that are low and vulgar; but at the same time he has not so many thoughts that are sublime and noble. The truth of it is, Virgil seldom rises into very astonishing sentiments, where he is not fired by the Iliad. He everywhere charms and pleases us by the force of his own genius; but seldom elevates and transports us where he does not fetch his hints from Homer.

Milton's chief talent, and indeed his distinguishing excellence, lies in the Sublimity of his thoughts. There are others of the moderns who rival him in every other part of Poetry; but in the Greatness of his sentiments he triumphs over all the Poets both modern and ancient, Homer only excepted. It is impossible for the imagination of man to dilate it self with greater ideas, than those which he has laid together in his first, second, and third books. The seventh, which describes the Creation of the world, is likewise wonderfully sublime; though not so apt to stir up emotion in the mind of the Reader, nor consequently so perfect in the Epic way of writing, because it is filled with less action. Let the judicious Reader compare what Longinus has observed on several passages in Homer, and he will find parallels for most of them in the Paradise Lost.

From what has been said we may infer, that as there are two kinds of Sentiments, the Natural and the Sublime, which are always to be pursued in an heroic Poem; there are also two kinds of thoughts which are carefully to be avoided. The first are such as are affected and unnatural; the second such as are mean and vulgar. As for the first kind of thoughts, we meet with little or nothing that is like them in Virgil: he has none of those trifling points and puerilities that are so often to be met with in Ovid, none of the Epigrammatic turns of Lucan, none of those swelling sentiments which are so frequently in Statius and Claudian, none of those mixed embellishments of Tasso. Every thing is just and natural. His Sentiments show that he had a perfect insight into humane nature, and that he knew every thing which was the most proper to affect it.

Mr. Dryden has in some places, which I may hereafter take notice of, misrepresented Virgil's way of thinking as to this particular, in the translation he has given us of the Aeneid. I do not remember that Homer, any where falls into the faults above-mentioned, which were indeed the false refinements of later ages. Milton, it must be confess, has sometimes erred in this respect, as I shall shew more at large in another paper; though considering all the Poets of the age in which he writ, he was infected with this wrong way of thinking, he is rather to be admired that he did not give more into it, than that he did sometimes comply with the vicious taste which still prevails so much among modern writers.

But since several thoughts may be natural which are low and groveling, an Epic Poet should not only avoid such Sentiments as are unnatural or affected, but also such as are mean and vulgar. Homer has opened a great field of raillery to men of more delicacy than greatness of genius, by the homeliness of some of his sentiments. But, as I have before said, these are rather to be imputed to the simplicity of the age in which he lived, to which I may also add, of that which he described, than to any imperfection in that divine Poet. Zoilus, among the ancients, and Monseur Perrault among the moderns, pushed their ridicule very far upon him, on account of some such sentiments. There is no blemish to be observed in Virgil, under this head; and but a very few in Milton.

I shall give but one instance of this impropriety of thought in Homer, and at the same time compare it with an instance of the same nature, both in Virgil and Milton. Sentiments which raise laughter can very seldom be be admitted with any decency into an heroic Poem, whose business is to excite passions of a much nobler nature. Homer, however, in his characters of Vulcan and Thersites, in his story of Mars and Venus, in his behaviour of Iris, and in other passages, has been observed to have lapsed into the burlesque character, and to have departed from that serious Air which seems essential to the magnificence of an Epic Poem. I remember but one laugh in the whole Aeneid, which rives in the fifth book upon Mousses, where he is represented as thrown overboard, and drying himself upon a rock. But this piece of mirth is so well timed, that the severe Critic can have nothing to say against it, for it is in the book of games and diversions, where the Reader’s mind may be supposed to be sufficiently relaxed for such an entertainment. The only piece of pleasantry in Paradise Lost, is where the evil spirits are described as rallying the Angels upon the success of their new invented artillery. This passage I look upon to be the most exceptionable in the whole Poem, as being nothing else but a fling of puns, and those too very indifferent.

--- Satan beheld their plight,
And to his mates thus in derision call’d,
O friends, why come not on these victors proud!
Ere while they fierce were coming, and when we,
To entertain them fair with open front,
And breasted (what could we more) propounded terms
Of composition; straight they changed their minds,
Flew off, and into strange vagaries fell,
As they would dance, yet for a dance they seem’d
Somewhat extravagant and wild, perhaps
For joy of offer’d peace; but I suppose
If our proposals once again were heard,
We should compel them to a quick refult.
To whom thus Belial in like game some mood.
Leader, the terms we feut, were terms of weight,
Of hard contents, and full of force urg’d home,
Such as we might perceive anus’d them all,
And humbled many who receiv’d them right,
Had need, from head to foot, well understand’d;
Not understand’d, this gift they have besides,
They shew us when our foes walk not upright.
Thus they among themselves in pleasant vein Stood scoffing ——

Saturday,
HAVING already treated of the Fable, the Characters and Sentiments in the Paradise Lost, we are in the last place to consider the Language; and as the learned world is very much divided upon Milton as to this point, I hope they will excuse me if I appear particular in any of my opinions, and encline to those who judge the most advantagiously of the Author.

It is requisite that the Language of an Heroic poem should be both Periphrastic and Sublime. In proportion as either of these two qualities are wanting, the Language is imperfect. Periphrasis is the first and most necessary qualification; insomuch that a good-natured Reader sometimes overlooks a little slip even in the Grammar or Syntax, where it is impossible for him to mistake the Poet's sense. Of this kind is that passage in Milton, wherein he speaks of Satan.

——God and his Son except,
Created thing naught val'd he nor shou'd.

And that in which he describes Adam and Eve.

Adam the goodliest man of men since born
His sons, the fairest of her daughters Eve.

It is plain, that in the former of these passages, according to the natural Syntax, the divine Persons mentioned in the first line are represented as Created Beings; and that in the other, Adam and Eve are confounded with their sons and daughters. Such little blemishes as these, when the thought is great and natural, we should, with Horace, impute to a pardopardonable inadvertency, or to the weakness of human nature, which cannot attend to each minute particular, and give the last finishing to every circumstance in so long a work. The ancient Critics therefore, who were actuated by a spirit of candour, rather than that of cavilling invented certain figures of speech, on purpose to palliate little errors of this nature in the writings of those Authors who had so many greater beauties to atone for them.

If Clearness and Perspicuity were only to be consulted, the Poet would have nothing else to do but to cloath his thoughts in the most plain and natural expressions. But since it often happens that the most obvious phrases, and those which are used in ordinary conversation, become too familiar to the ear, and contrast a kind of Meaneness by passing through the mouths of the vulgar, a Poet should take particular care to guard himself against idiomatic ways of speaking. Ovid and Lucan have many poornesses of expression upon this account, as taking up with the first phrases that offered, without putting themselves to the trouble of looking after such as would not only be natural, but also elevated and sublime.
Milton has but a few failings in this kind, of which, however, you may meet with some instances, as in the following passages.

Embryo's and Idiots, Eremites and Fryars
White, black and grey, with all their trumpery, Here Pilgrims roam
— A while discourse they hold,
No fear least dinner cool, when thus began
Our Author
Who of all Ages to succeed, but feeling
The evil on him brought by me, will curse
My head, ill save our Ancestor impure,
For this we may thank Adam

The great masters in composition know very well that many an elegant phrase becomes improper for a Poet or an Orator, when it has been debated by common use. For this reason the works of ancient Authors, which are written in dead languages, have a great advantage over those which are written in languages that are now spoken. Were there any mean phrases or idioms in Virgil and Homer, they would not shock the ear of the most delicate modern Reader, so much as they would have done that of an old Greek or Roman, because we never hear them pronounced in our streets, or in ordinary conversation.
It is not therefore sufficient, that the Language of an Epic poem be Perfidious, unless it be also Sublime. To this end it ought to deviate from the common forms and ordinary phrasés of speech. The judgment of a Poet very much discovers it self in churning the common roads of expression, without falling into such ways of speech as may seem stiff and unnatural; he must not swell into a false sublime, by endeavouring to avoid the other extreme. Among the Greeks, Æschylus, and sometimes Sophocles were guilty of this fault; among the Latins, Claudian and Statius; and among our own countrymen, Shakespeare and Lee. In these Authors the affectation of Greatness often hurts the Perfidiousness of the style, as in many others the endeavour after Perfidiousness prejudices its Greatness.

Aristotle has observed, that the Idiomatic file may be avoided, and the Sublime formed, by the following methods. First, by the use of metaphors: such are those in Milton.

\begin{align*}
\text{Imparadis'd in one another's arms,} & \quad \text{And in his hand a reed.} \\
\text{Stood weav'd tip with fire;} & \quad \text{The grasse clost now calv'd.} \\ \text{Spangled with eyes} &

In these and innumerable other instances, the metaphors are very bold but just; I must however observe, that the metaphors are not thick-woven in Milton, which always favours too much of wit; that they never clash with one another, which, as Aristotle observes, turns a sentence into a kind of an Enigma or Riddle; and that he seldom has recourse to them where the proper and natural words will do as well.

Another way of raising the language, and giving it a poetical turn, is to make use of the Idioms of other tongues. Virgil is full of the Greek forms of speech, which the Critics call Hellenisms, as Horace in his Odes abounds with them, much more than Virgil. I need not mention the several dialects which Homer has made use of for this end. Milton in conformity with the practice of the ancient Poets, and with Aristotle's rule, has infused a great many Latinisms as well as Hellenisms, and sometimes Hebrewms, into the language of his poem; as towards the beginning of it,

\begin{align*}
\text{Nor did they not perceive the evil plight} & \quad \text{In which they were, or the fierce pains not feel.} \\ \end{align*}

Yet
Yet to their General's voice they soon obey'd.

Who shall tempt with wondring fact
The dark unbottom'd infinite Abyss,
And through the palpable obscure find out
His uncouth way, or spread his airy flight
Upborn with indefatigable wings
Over the vast Abrupt?

So both ascend
In the visions of God

B. II.

Under this head may be reckoned the placing the adjective after the substantive, the transposition of words, the turning the adjective into a substantive, with several other foreign modes of speech, which this Poet has naturalized to give his verse the greater found, and throw it out of prose.

The third method mentioned by Aristotle, is what agrees with the Genius of the Greek language more than with that of any other tongue, and is therefore more used by Homer than by any other Poet. I mean the lengthening of a phrase by the addition of words, which may either be inserted or omitted, as also by the extending or contracting of particular words by the insertion or omission of certain syllables. Milton has put in practice this method of raising his language, as far as the nature of our tongue will permit, as in the passage above-mentioned, Eremita, for what is Hermit in common discourse. If you observe the measure of his verse, he has with great judgment suppressed a syllable in several words, and shortened those of two syllables into one, by which method, besides the above-mentioned advantage, he has given a greater variety to his numbers. But this practice is more particularly remarkable in the names of persons and of countries, as Béulzebub, Hesperus, and in many other particulars, wherein he has either changed the name, or made use of that which is not the most commonly known, that he might the better depart from the language of the vulgar.

The same reason recommended to him several old words, which also makes his poem appear the more venerable, and gives it a greater air of antiquity.

I must likewise take notice, that there are in Milton several words of his own coinage, as Cerberus, miscreant, hell-mouthed, Embryon Atoms, and many others. If the Reader is offended at this Liberty in our English Poet, I would recommend him to a discourse in Plutarch, which shows us how frequently Homer has made use of the same liberty.

Milton
Milton by the above-mentioned helps, and by the choice of the noblest words and phrases which our tongue would afford him, has carried our language to a greater height than any of the English Poets have ever done before or after him, and made the sublimity of his style equal to that of his sentiments.

I have been the more particular in these observations on Milton's style, because it is that part of him in which he appears the most singular. The remarks I have here made upon the practice of other Poets, with my observations out of Aristotle, will perhaps alleviate the prejudice which some have taken to his poem upon this account; tho' after all, I must confess, that I think his style, though admirable in general, is in some places too much stiffened and obscured by the frequent use of those methods, which Aristotle has preferred for the raising of it.

This redundancy of those several ways of speech which Aristotle calls foreign language, and with which Milton has so very much enriched, and in some places darkned the language of his poem, was the more proper for his use, because his poem is written in blank verse. Rhyme, without any other assistance, throws the language off from prose, and very often makes an indifferent phrase pass unregarded; but where the verse is not built upon rhymes, there pomp of sound, and energy of expression, are indispensible necessary to support the style, and keep it from falling into the flatness of prose.

Those who have not a taste for this elevation of style, and are apt to ridicule a Poet when he goes out of the common forms of expression, would do well to see how Aristotle has treated an ancient author, called Euclid, for his impudic mirth upon this occasion. Mr. Dryden used to call this sort of men his Prose-critics.

I should, under this head of the Language, consider Milton's Numbers, in which he has made use of several elisions, that are not customary among other English Poets, as may be particularly observed in his cutting off the Letter ?; when it precedes a vowel. This, and some other innovations in the measure of his verse, has varied his numbers, in such a manner, as makes them incapable of flattering the ear and cloying the Reader, which the same uniform measure would certainly have done, and which the perpetual returns of rhyme never fail to do in long narrative poems. I shall close these reflections upon the Language of Paradise Lost, with observing that Milton has copied after Homer, rather than Virgil, in the length of his periods, the copiousness of his phrases, and the running of his verses into one another.

--- Ubi plura nitent in carmine, non ego paucis Offendar maculis, quas aut incuria judit,
Aut humana parum cœvit natura ---- Hor.

I have now considered Milton's Paradise Lost under those four great heads of the Fable, the Characters, the Sentiments, and the Language; and have shewn that he excels, in general, under each of these heads. I hope that I have made several discoveries which may appear new, even to those who are versed in critical learning. Were I, indeed, to chuse my Readers, by whose judgment I would stand or fall, they should not be such as are acquainted only with the French and Italian Critics, but also with the Ancient and Modern who have written in either of the learned languages. Above all, I would have them well versed in the Greek and Latin Poets, without which a man very often fancies that he understands a Critic, when in reality he does not comprehend his meaning.

It is in Criticism, as in all other sciences and speculations; one who brings with him any implicit notions and observations which he has made in his reading of the Poets, will find his own reflections methodized and explained, and perhaps several little hints that had passed in his mind, perfected and improved in the Works of a good Critic; whereas one who has not these previous lights, is very often an utter stranger to what he reads, and apt to put a wrong interpretation upon it.

Nor is it sufficient, that a man who sets up for a Judge in Criticism, should have perused the Authors above-mentioned, unless he has also a clear and logical head. Without this Talent he is perpetually puzzled and perplexed amidst his own Blunders, mistakes the sense of those he would confute, or if he chances to think right, does not know how to convey his thoughts to another with clearness and perspicuity. Aristotle, who was the best Critic, was also one of the best Logicians that ever appeared in the world.

O 0 2. Mr.
Mr. Locke's Essay on human understanding would be thought a very odd book for a man to make himself master of, who would get a reputation by critical writings; though at the same time it is very certain, that an Author who has not learned the art of distinguishing between words and things, and of ranging his thoughts, and setting them in proper lights, whatever notions he may have, will lose himself in confusion and obscurity. I might further observe, that there is not a Greek or Latin Critic who has not known, even in the state of his Criticisms, that he was a master of all the elegance and delicacy of his native tongue.

The truth of it is, there is nothing more absurd than for a man to set up for a Critic, without a good insight into all the parts of learning; whereas many of those who have endeavored to signalize themselves by works of this nature among our English writers, are not only defective in the above-mentioned particulars, but plainly discover by the phrases which they make use of, and by their confused way of thinking, that they are not acquainted with the most common and ordinary systems of arts and sciences. A few general rules extracted out of the French Authors, with a certain cant of words, has sometimes set up an illiterate heavy writer for a most judicious and formidable Critic.

One great mark, by which you may discover a Critic who has neither taste nor learning, is this, that he seldom ventures to praise any passage in an Author which has not been before received and applauded by the public, and that his criticism turns wholly upon little faults and errors. This part of a Critic is so very easy to succeed in, that we find every ordinary Reader, upon the publishing of a new Poem, has wit and ill-nature enough to turn several passages of it into ridicule, and very often in the right place. This Mr. Dryden has very agreeably remarked in those two celebrated lines,

*Errors, like straws, upon the surface flow;
He who would search for pearls, must dive below.*

A true Critic ought to dwell rather upon excellencies than imperfections, to discover the concealed beauties of a writer, and communicate to the world such things as are worth their observation. The most exquisite words and finest strokes of an Author are those which very often appear the most doubtful and exceptionable, to a man who wants a relish for polite learning; and they are these, which a sole undistinguishing Critic generally attacks with the greatest violence. Tully observes, that it is very easy to brand or fix a mark upon what he calls verbum ardens, or,
as it may be rendred into English, a glowing bold expression, and to turn it into ridicule by a cold ill-natured criticism. A little wit is equally capable of exposing a beauty, and of aggravating a fault; and though such a treatment of an Author naturally produces indignation in the mind of an understanding reader, it has however its effect among the generality of those whose hands it falls into; the rabble of mankind being very apt to think that every thing which is laughed at with any mixture of wit, is ridiculous in itself.

Such a mirth as this is always unfeasonable in a Critic, as it rather prejudices the Reader than convinces him, and is capable of making a beauty, as well as a blemish, the subject of derision. A man, who cannot write with wit on a proper subject, is dull and stupid, but one who shews it in an improper place, is as impertinent and absurd. Besides, a man who has the gift of ridicule, is apt to find fault with any thing that gives him an opportunity of exerting his beloved talent, and very often centuries a passage, not because there is any fault in it, but because he can be merry upon it. Such kinds of pleasantry are very unfair and disingenerous in works of Criticism, in which the greatest matters, both an-tient and modern, have always appeared with a serious and instructive air.

As I intend in my next paper to shew the defects in Milton's Paradise Lost, I thought fit to premise these few particulars, to the end that the Reader may know I enter upon it, as on a very ungrateful work, and that I shall just point at the imperfections, without endeavouring to en-flame them with ridicule. I must also observe with Longinus, that the productions of a great genius, with many lapses and inadvertencies, are infinitely preferable to the works of an inferior kind of Author, which are scrupulously exact and conformable to all the rules of correct writing.

I shall conclude my paper with a story out of Boccacini, which sufciently shews us the opinion that judicious Author entertained of the art of Critics I have been here mentioning. A famous Critic, says he, having gathered together all the faults of an eminent Poet, made a present of them to Apollo, who received them very graciously, and resolved to make the Author a suitable return for the trouble he had been at in collecting them. In order to this, he set before him a sack of wheat, as it had been just threshed out of the sheaf. He then bid him pick out the chaff from among the corn, and lay it aside by itself. The Critic applied himself to the task with great industry and pleasure: and after having made the due separation, was presented by Apollo with the chaff for his pains.

Satur-
After what I have said in my last Saturday's paper, I shall enter on the subject of this without farther preface, and remark the several defects which appear in the Fable, the characters, the sentiments, and the language of Milton's Paradise Lost; not doubting but the Reader will pardon me, if I allude at the same time whatever may be said for the extenuation of such defects. The first imperfection which I shall observe in the Fable is, that the event of it is unhappy.

The Fable of every poem is according to Aristotle's division either Simple or Implex. It is called Simple when there is no change of fortune in it; Implex when the fortune of the chief Actor changes from bad to good, or from good to bad. The Implex Fable is thought the most perfect; I suppose, because it is more proper to stir up the passions of the Reader, and to surprize him with a greater variety of accidents.

The Implex Fable is therefore of two kinds: in the first the chief Actor makes his way through a long series of dangers and difficulties, till he arrives at honour and prosperity, as we see in the story of Ulysses. In the second, the chief Actor in the Poem falls from some eminent pitch of honour and prosperity, into misery and disgrace. Thus we see Adam and Eve sinking from a state of innocence and happiness, into the most abject condition of sin and sorrow.

The most taking tragedies among the antients were built on this last sort of Implex Fable, particularly the Tragedy of Oedipus, which proceeds upon a story, if we may believe Aristotle, the most proper for Tragedy that could be invented by the wit of man. I have taken some pains in a former paper to shew, that this kind of Implex Fable, wherein the event is unhappy, is more apt to affect an audience than that of the first kind; notwithstanding many excellent pieces among the antients, as well as most most of those which have been written of late years in our own country, are raised upon contrary plans. I must however own, that I think this kind of Fable, which is the most perfect in Tragedy, is not so proper for an Heroic Poem.

Milton seems to have been sensible of this imperfection in his Fable, and has therefore endeavoured to cure it by several expedients; particularly by the mortification which the great adversary of mankind meets with upon his return to the assembly of infernal spirits, as it is described in a beautiful passage of the tenth book; and likewise by the vision, wherein Adam at the close of the Poem sees his off-spring triumphing over his great enemy, and himself restored to a happier Paradise than that from which he fell.

There is another objection against Milton's Fable, which is indeed almost the same with the former, though placed in a different light, namely, That the Hero in the Paradise Lost is unsuccessful, and by no means a match for his enemies. This gave occasion to Mr. Dryden's reflection, that the Devil was in reality Milton's Hero. I think I have obviated this objection in my first paper. The Paradise Lost is an Epic, or a Narrative Poem, and he that looks for an Hero in it, searches for that which Milton never intended; but if he will needs fix the name of an Hero upon any person in it, it is certainly the Messiah who is the Hero, both in the principal action, and in the chief episodes. Paganism could not furnish out a real action for a Fable greater than that of the Iliad or Aeneid, and therefore an heathen could not form a higher notion of a Poem than one of that kind which they call an Heroic. Whether Milton's is not of a sublimer nature I will not presume to determine: It is sufficient, that I shew there is in the Paradise Lost all the Greatness of plan, Regularity of design, and Masterly beauties which we discover in Homer and Virgil.

I must in the next place observe, that Milton has interwoven in the texture of his Fable some particulars which do not seem to have probability enough for an Epic Poem, particularly in the actions which he ascribes to Sin and Death, and the picture which he draws of the Limbo of Vanity, with other passages in the second book. Such allegories rather favour of the spirit of Spenser and Ariosto, than of Homer and Virgil.

In the structure of his Poem he has likewise admitted of too many digressions. It is finely observed by Ariosto, that the author of an Heroic Poem should seldom speak himself, but throw as much of his work as he can into the mouths of those who are his principal Actors.

tle has given no reason for this precept; but I presume it is because the mind of the Reader is more awed and elevated when he hears Aeneas or Achilles speak, than when Virgil or Homer talk in their own person.
Besides that assuming the character of an eminent man is apt to fire the imagination, and raise the ideas of an author, Tully tells us, mentioning his dialogue of old age, in which Cato is the chief speaker, that upon a review of it he was agreeably imposed upon, and fancied that it was Cato, and not he himself, who uttered his thoughts on that subject.
If the Reader would be at the pains to see how the story of the Iliad and Aeneid is delivered by those persons who act in it, he will be surprised to find how little in either of these Poems proceeds from the authors. Milton has, in the general disposition of his fable, very finely observed this great rule; inasmuch, that there is scarce a third part of it which comes from the Poet; the rest is spoken either by Adam and Eve, or by some good or evil spirit who is engaged either in their destruction or defence.

From what has been here observed, it appears that digressions are by no means to be allowed of in an Epic Poem. If the Poet, even in the ordinary course of his narration, should speak as little as possible, he should certainly never let his narration sleep for the sake of any reflections of his own. I have often observed, with a secret admiration, that the longuest reflection in the Aeneid is in that passage of the tenth book, where Turnus is represented as dining himself in the spoils of Pallas, whom he had slain. Virgil here lets his fable stand still for the sake of the following remark. How is the mind of man ignorant of Futury, and unable to bear prosperous fortune with moderation? The time will come when Turnus shall wish that he had left the body of Pallas un touched, and curp the day on which he dressed himself in those spoils. As the great event of the Aeneid, and the death of Turnus, whom Aeneas flew because he saw him adorned with the spoils of Pallas, turns upon this incident, Virgil went out of his way to make this reflection upon it, without which so small a circumstance might possibly have slipped out of his reader’s memory. Lucan, who was an injudicious Poet, lets drop his story very frequently for the sake of his unnecessary digressions, or his Diverticula, as Scaliger calls them. If he gives us an account of the prodigies which preceded the civil war, he declaims upon the occasion, and fumes how much happier it would be for man, if he did not feel his evil fortune before it comes to pass, and suffer not only by its real weight, but by the apprehension of it. Milton’s complaint for his blindness, his Panegyric on marriage, his reflections on Adam and Eve’s going naked, of the Angels
Angels eating, and several other passages in his poem, are liable to the same exception, though I must confess there is so great a beauty in these very digressions, that I would not with them out of his poem.

I have, in a former paper, spoken of the Characters of Milton's Paradise Lost, and declared my opinion, as to the Allegorical Personages who are introduced in it.

If we look into the Sentiments, I think they are sometimes defective under the following heads: First, as there are several of them too much pointed, and some that degenerate even into puns. Of this last kind, I am afraid is that in the first book, where speaking of the Pigmies, he calls them

---The small Infantry

War'd on by Cranes---

Another Blemish that appears in some of his thoughts, is his frequent allusion to heathen Fables, which are not certainly of a piece with the divine subject, of which he treats. I do not find fault with these allusions, where the Poet himself represents them as Fabulous, as he does in some places, but where he mentions them as Truths and Matters of Fact. The limits of my Paper will not give me leave to be particular in instances of this kind; the Reader will easily remark them in his perusal of the poem.

A third fault in his Sentiments, is an unnecessary Ostracism of Learning, which likewise occurs very frequently. It is certain, that both Homer and Virgil were masters of all the learning of their times, but it flows itself in their works, after an indirect and concealed manner. Milton seems ambitious of letting us know, by his excursions on Free-will and Predetermination, and his many glances upon History, Astronomy, Geography and the like, as well as by the terms and phrases he sometimes makes use of, that he was acquainted with the whole circle of Arts and Sciences.

If, in the last place, we consider the Language of this great Poet, we must allow what I have hinted in a former Paper, that it is often too much laboured, and sometimes obscured by old words, transformations, and foreign idioms. Seneca's objection to the Stile of a great Author, Rerum ejus oratio, nihil in ea placidum, nihil tene, is what many Critics make to Milton: As I cannot wholly refute it, so I have already apologized for it in another Paper; to which I may further add, that Milton's Sentiments and Ideas were so wonderfully sublime, that it would have been been impossible for him to have represented them in their full strength and beauty, without having recourse to these foreign affiances. Our language sunk under him, and was unequal to that Greatness of Soul which furnished him with such glorious conceptions.

A second fault in his Language is, that he often affects a kind of Jingle in his words, as in the following passages, and many others:

\text{And brought into the World a World of woe.}

\text{Began the Almighty throne}

\text{Beseeching or believing}

\text{This tempered our Attempt}

\text{At one slight Bound high over-kept all Bound}

I know there are figures for this kind of speech, that some of the greatest Antients have been guilty of it, and that Aristotle himself has given it a place in his Rhetoric among the beauties of that Art. But as it is in itself poor and trifling, it is I think at present universally exploded by all the Masters of polite writing.

The last fault which I shall take notice of in Milton's Style, is the frequent use of what the Learned call Technical Words, or Terms of Art.

It is one of the great beauties of Poetry, to make hard things intelligible, and to deliver what is abstruse of it self in such easy language as may be understood by ordinary Readers: Besides, that the knowledge of a Poet should rather seem born with him, or inspired, than drawn from books and systems. I have often wondered, how Mr. Dryden could translate a passage out of Virgil, after the following manner,

\text{Tack to the Larboard, and stand off to sea,}

\text{Veer star-board sea and land.}

\text{Milton makes use of Larboard in the same manner. When he is upon}

\text{Building, he mentions Doric Pillars, Pilasters, Cornice, Freeze, Architrave. When he talks of heavenly Bodies, you meet with Eclipce,}

\text{and Eccentric, the Trepidation, Stars dropping from the Zenith, Rays}

\text{culminating from the Equator. To which might be added many Instances}

\text{of the like kind in several other Arts and Sciences.}

I shall in my next papers give an account of the many particular Beauties in Milton, which would have been too long to insert under those general heads I have already treated of, and with which I intend to conclude this piece of Criticism.

Saturday,
Have seen in the works of a modern Philosopher, a map of the Spots in the Sun. My last paper of the Faults and Blemishes in Milton's Paradise Lost, may be considered as a piece of the same nature. To pursue the Allusion: As it is observed, that among the bright parts of the luminous body above-mentioned, there are some which glow more intensely, and dart a stronger light than others; so, notwithstanding I have already shewn Milton's Poem to be very beautiful in general, I shall now proceed to take notice of such Beauties as appear to be more exquisite than the rest. Milton has proposed the Subject of his Poem in the following verses:

Of Man's first disobedience, and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought Death into the world, and all our woe,
With loss of Eden, till one greater Man
Restored us, and regain the blissful Seat,
Sing Heav'ly Muse——

These lines are perhaps as plain, simple and unadorned as any of the whole Poem, in which particular the Author has conformed himself to the example of Homer, and the precept of Horace.

His Invocation to a work which turns in a great measure upon the Creation of the world, is very properly made to the Muse who inspired Moses in those books from whence our Author drew his subject, and to the Holy Spirit who is therein representer as operating after a particular manner in the first production of Nature. This whole Exordium rises very happily into noble Language and Sentiment, as I think the Transition to the Fable is exquisitely beautiful and natural.
The Nine-days affliction, in which the Angels lay entranced after their dreadful overthrow and fall from heaven, before they could recover either the use of thought or speech, is a noble Circumstance, and very finely imagined. The division of hell into Seas of Fire, and into firm Ground impregnated with the fame furious Element, with that particular circumstance of the Exclusion of Hope from those infernal re-regions, are instances of the fame great and fruitful Invention.

The Thoughts in the first speech and description of Satan, who is one of the principal Actors in this poem, are wonderfully proper to give us a full Idea of him. His Pride, Envy and Revenge, Obstinacy, Delspair and Impenitence, are all of them very artfully interwoven. In short, his first speech is a Complication of all those Passions which discover them-theselves separately in several other of his speeches in the poem. The whole Part of this great enemy of mankind is filled with such Incidents as are very apt to raise and terrify the Reader’s Imagination. Of this nature, in the book now before us, is his being the first that awakens out of the general Trance, with his Posture on the burning Lake, his Rising from it, and the description of his Shield and Spear.

Thus Satan talking to his nearest mate,
With head up-lift above the wave, and eyes
That sparkling blazed, his other parts beside Prone on the flood, extended long and large,
Lay floating many a rood——

Forthwith upright he rears from off the pool
His mighty Stature; on each hand the flames Driven backward slope their pointing spires, and round
In billows leave ’tib midst a horrid vale.

Then with expanded wings he scores his flight
Aloft, incumbent on the dusky air
That felt unusual weight——

—— His ponderous Shield,
Etherial temper, miffie, large and round,
Behind him cast, the broad circumference
Hung on his shoulders like the Moon, whose orb
Thro’ Optic glafs the Tucan Artists view
At Evening from the top of Fesole,
Or in Valdarno, to survey new Lands,
Rivers or mountains in her Spotty Globe.
His Spear, to equal which the tallest Pine Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the Mast
Of some great Admiral, were but a wand,
He walk'd with to support uneasy steps
Over the burning Marl—

To which we may add his Call to the fallen Angels that lay plunged
And stupefied in the Sea of Fire:

He call'd so loud, that all the hollow deep
Of bell resounded—

But there is no single passage in the whole poem worked up to a greater Sublimity, than that wherein his Person is described in those celebrated lines:

——He, above the rest
In shape and gesture proudly eminent Stood like a Tower, &c.

His Sentiments are every way answerable to his Character, and suitable to a created Being of the most exalted and depraved nature. Such is that in which he takes possession of his place of torments.

——Hail Horrors, hail Infernal world! and thou profoundest hell
Receive thy new Possessor: one who brings
A mind not to be changed by place or time.

And afterwards,

——Here at least
We shall be Free; th' Almighty hath not built
Here for his Enemy, will not drive us hence:
Here we may reign secure, and in my choice
To reign is worth ambition, tho' in hell:
Better to reign in hell, than serve in heaven.

Amidst those Impieties which this enraged Spirit utters in other places of the Poem, the Author has taken care to introduce none that is not big with Aburdity, and incapable of shocking a religious Reader; his words, as the Poet describes them, bearing only a Semblance of worth, not Substance. He is likewise with great art described as owning his Adversary to be Almighty. Whatever perverse Interpretation he puts on the Justice, Mercy,
Mercy, and other attributes of the Supreme Being, he frequently confesses his Omnipotence, that being the perfection he was forced to allow him, and the only consideration which could support his Pride under the flame of his defeat.

Nor must I here omit that beautiful circumstance of his bursting out in tears, upon his survey of those innumerable spirits whom he had involved in the same guilt and ruin with himself.

—He now prepared
To speak; whereas their doubled ranks they bend
From wing to wing, and half enclose him round
With all his peers: attention held them mute.
Thrice he assayed, and thrice in spite of scorn
Tears, such as Angels weep, burst forth—

The catalogue of evil spirits has abundance of learning in it, and a very agreeable turn of Poetry, which rises in a great measure from its describing the places where they were worshipped, by those beautiful marks of rivers, so frequent among the ancient Poets. The Author had doubtless in this place Homer's catalogue of ships, and Virgil's list of warriors in his view. The characters of Moloch and Bethal prepare the Reader's mind for their respective speeches and behaviour in the second and sixth book. The account of Thammuz is finely romantic, and suitable to what we read among the ancients of the worship which was paid to that idol.

—Thammuz came next behind,
Whose annual wound in Lebanon aln'rd
The Syrian damsel's to lament his fate
In am'rous ditties all a summer's day;
While smooth Adonis from his native rock
Ran purple to the sea, suppos'd with blood
Of Thammuz yearly wounded: the low's tale
Infected Sion's daughters with like heat;
Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
Ezekiel saw, when by the Vision led His eye survey'd the dark idolatries
Of alienated Judah.—

The Reader will pardon me if I insert as a note on this beautiful passage, the account given us by the late ingenious Mr. Mannrell of this ancient piece of worship, and probably the first occasion of such a supersuperstition. "We came to a fair large river——doubtless the ancien ent river Adonis, so famous for the idolatrous rites performed here in lamentation of Adonis. We had the fortune to see what may be sup posed to be the occasion of that opinion which Lucian relates, conser ving this river, viz. That this stream, at certain seasons of the year, especially about the feast of Adonis, is of a bloody colour; which the heathens looked upon as proceeding from a kind of sympathy in the river for the death of Adonis, who was killed by a wild boar in the mountains, out of which this stream rises. Something like this we daub actually come to pass; for the water was stained to a surprising redness; and, as we observed in travelling, had discoloured the sea a great way into a reddish hue, occasioned doubtless by a sort of Mini um, or red earth, washed into the river by the violence of the rain, and not by any stain from Adonis's blood.

The passage in the catalogue, explaining the manner how spirits trans form themselves by contraction, or enlargement of their dimensions, is introduced with great judgment, to make way for several surprising ac cidents in the sequel of the Poem. There follows one, at the very end of the first book, which is what the French Critics call marvellous, but at the same time probable, by reason of the passage last mentioned.
As soon as the Infernal Palace is finished, we are told the multi itude and rabble of spirits immediately shrunken themselves into a small compass, that there might be room for such a numberless assembly in this capacious hall. But it is the Poet's refinement upon this thought, which I most admire, and which is indeed very noble in itself. For he tells us, that notwithstanding the vulgar, among the fallen spirits, con tracted their forms, those of the first rank and dignity still preferred their natural dimensions.

Thus incorporeal Spirits to smallest forms
Reduc'd their shapes immense, and were at large Though without number all amidst the hall
Of that infernal Court. But far within,
And in their own dimensions like themselves,
The great Seraphic Lords and Cherubim,
In close recess and secret conclave sat,
A thousand holy gods on golden seats,
Frequent and fall——

The
The character of Mammon, and the description of the Pandemonium, are full of beauties.

There are several other strokes in the first book wonderfully poetical, and instances of that Sublime genius so peculiar to the Author. Such is the description of Asaël's stature, and of the infernal standard, which he unfurls; as also of that ghastly light, by which the fiends appear to one another in their place of torments.

The seat of desolation, void of light,
Save what the glimmering of these livid flames
Causes pale and dreadful—

The shout of the whole host of fallen Angels when drawn up in battle array:

---

The universal host up sent
A shout that tore hell's concave, and beyond Frigid the reign of Chaos and old Night.

The review, which the leader makes of his infernal army:

---

He thro' the armed files
Darts his experience'd eye; and soon traverses
The whole battalion views their order due,
Their visages and stature as of gods,
Their number left be millions, and now his heart
Disdains with pride, and hardening in his strength Glories—

The flash of light, which appeared upon the drawing of their Swords:

---

He spake: and to confirm his words out flew Millions of flaming swords, drawn from the thigh
Of mighty Cherubim; the sudden blaze:
Far round illumin'd Hell—

The sudden production of the Pandemonium;

---

Aon out of the earth a fabric huge
Rise like an exhalation, with the sound
Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet.

The artificial illuminations made in it.
From the arched roof
Pendent by subtle Magic, many a row
Of flar'y lamps and blazing creffets, fed
With Naphtha and Aliphaltus, yielded light
As from a sky.

There are also several noble Similes and Allusions in the first book of Paradise Lost. And here I must observe, that when Milton alludes either to things or persons, he never quits his Simile till it rises to some very great idea, which is often foreign to the occasion that gave birth to it. The resemblance does not, perhaps, last above a line or two, but the Poet runs on with the hint, till he has raised out of it some glorious image or sentiment, proper to inflame the mind of the Reader, and to give it that sublime kind of entertainment, which is suitable to the nature of an Heroic Poem. Those, who are acquainted with Homer's and Virgil's way of writing, cannot but be pleased with this kind of structure in Milton's Similitudes. I am the more particular on this head, because ignorant Readers, who have formed their taste upon the quaint Similes, and little turns of wit, which are so much in vogue among modern Poets, cannot relish these beauties which are of a much higher nature, and are therefore apt to confute Milton's comparisons, in which they do not see any surprising points of likeness. Monsieur Perrault was a man of this vitiated relish, and for that very reason has endeavoured to turn into ridicule several of Homer's Similitudes, which he calls Comparaisons à longue queue, Long-tail'd comparisons. I shall conclude this paper on the first book of Milton with the answer which Monsieur Boileau makes to Perrault on this occasion: "Comparisons, says he, in Odes and Epic Poems are not introduced only to illustrate and embellish the discourse, but to amuse and relax the mind of the Reader, by frequently disengaging him from too painful an attention to the principal subject, and by leading him into other agreeable images. Homer, says he, excelled in this particular, whose Comparisons abound with such images of nature as are proper to relieve and diversifie his subjects. He continually instructs the Reader, and makes him take notice, even in objects which are every day before our eyes, of such circumstances as we should not otherwise have observed. To this he adds, as a maxim universally acknowledged, that it is not necessary in Poetry for the Points of the comparison to correspond with one another exactly, but that a general resemblance is sufficient, and that too much much nicety in this particular favours of the Rhetorician and Epigrammatist.

In short, if we look into the conduct of Homer, Virgil, and Milton, as the great Fable is the soul of each Poem, to give their works an agreeable variety, their Epistles are to many short Fables, and their Similes to many short Epistles; to which you may add if you please, that their Metaphors are to many short Similes. If the Reader considers the Comparisons in the first book of Milton, of the Sun in an eclipse, of the sleeping Leviathan, of the Bees swarming about the hive, of the Fairy dance, in the view wherein I have placed them, he will easily discover the great beauties that are in each of those passages.

N° 309. Saturday, February 23.

Di, quibus imperium est animarum, umbraque silentes,
Et Chaos, et Phlegethon, loca nocte silentia late;
Sit mibi fas audita loqui! sit numine vestro
Pandere res alta terra et caligine mersas.

Virg.

I have before observed in general, that the persons whom Milton introduces into his Poem always discover such sentiments and behaviour, as are in a peculiar manner conformable to their respective characters. Every circumstance in their speeches and actions, is with great justness and delicacy adapted to the persons who speak and act. As the Poet very much excels in this constancy of his characters, I shall beg leave to consider several passages of the second book in this light. That superior greatness, and mock-majesty, which is ascribed to the Prince of the fallen Angels, is admirably preferable in the beginning of this book. His opening and closing the debate; his taking on himself that great enterprise at the thought of which the whole infernal assembly trembled; his encountering the hideous phantom who guarded the gates of Hell, and appeared to him in all his terrors; are instances of that proud and daring mind which could not brook submission even to Omnipotence.

Satan
Satan was now at hand, and from his seat
The monster moving onward came as fast
With horrid strides, Hell trembled as he strode,
Th' undaunted Fiend what this might be admir'd, Admir'd, not fear'd —

The same boldness and intrepidity of behaviour discovers itself in the several adventures, which he meets with during his passage through the regions of unformed matter, and particularly in his address to those tremendous powers who are described as presiding over it.

The part of Moloch is likewise in all its circumstances full of that fire and fury, which distinguish this spirit from the rest of the fallen Angels. He is described in the first book as befouled with the blood of humane sacrifices, and delighted with the tears of Parents and the cries of Children. In the second book he is marked out as the fiercest spirit that fought in Heaven; and if we consider the figure which he makes in the sixth book, where the battle of the Angels is described, we find it every way answerable to the same furious enraged Character.

——Where the might of Gabriel fought,
And with fierce ensigns pierc'd the deep array
Of Moloc, furious King, who him defy'd,
And at his chariot-wheels to drag him bound Threaten'd, nor from the Holy One of heav'n
Refrain'd his tongue blasphemous; but anon
Down cloven to the waste, with shatter'd arms
And uncoath'd pain fled bellowing. ———

It may be worth while to observe, that Milton has represented this violent impetuous Spirit, who is hurried on by such precipitate passions, as the first that rises in that assembly, to give his opinion upon their present posture of affairs. Accordingly he declares himself abruptly for war, and appears incensed at his companions, for losing so much time as even to deliberate upon it. All his sentiments are rash, audacious and desperate. Such is that of arming themselves with tortures, and turning their punishments upon him who inflicted them.

——No, let us rather chuse,
Arm'd with Hell-flames and fury, all at once
O'er Heav'n's high town's to force resolute's way,
Turning our tortures into horrid arms

Q q 2

Against
Against the tort'rer; when to meet the noise
Of his Almighty Engine shall be seen.
Infernal Thunder, and for lighting see.
Black fire and horror follow with equal rage.
Among his Angels; and his throne it is so Mixed with Tartaric sulphur, and strange fire,
His own invented tortures.

His preferring annihilation to shame or misery, is also highly suitable to his character; as the comfort he draws from their disturbing the peace of Heaven, that if it be not victory, it is revenge, is a sentiment trudiabolical, and becoming the bitterness of this implacable Spirit.

Belial is described, in the first book, as the Idol of the jewed and luxurious. He is in the second book, pursuant to that description, characterized as timorous and slothful; and if we look into the sixth book we find him celebrated in the battle of Angels for nothing but that scoff-ing speech which he makes to Satan, on their supposed advantage over the enemy. As his appearance is uniform, and of a piece in these three several views, we find his Sentiments in the Infernal Assembly every way conformable to his Character. Such are his apprehensions of a second battle, his horrors of annihilation, his preferring to be miserable rather than not to be. I need not observe, that the contrast of thought in this speech, and that which precedes it, gives an agreeable variety to the debate.

Mammon's Character is so fully drawn in the first book, that the Poet adds nothing to it in the second. We were before told, that he was the first who taught mankind to ranack the earth for gold and silver, and that he was the architect of Pandemonium, or the Infernal Palace, where the evil spirits were to meet in council. His speech in this book is every where suitable to so depraved a Character. How proper is that reflection, of their being unable to taste the happiness of Heaven were they actually there, in the mouth of one, who while he was in Heaven is said to have had his mind dazzled with the outward pomp and glories of the place, and to have been more intent on the riches of the pavement, than on the beatific vision. I shall also leave the Reader to judge how agreeable the following Sentiments are to the same Character.

This deep world
Of darkness do we dread? how oft amidst Thick cloud and dark doth Heav'n's all-ruling Sire

Close
Chu to reside, his Glory unfeared,
And with the Majesty of darkness round
Covers his throne; from whence deep Thunders roar
Mustring their rage, and Heav'n resembles Hell?
As he our darkness, cannot see his light
Imitate when we please? this distant Soil
Wants not her hidden treasures, gems and gold;
Nor want we skill or art, from whence to raise Magnificence, and what can Heav'n show more?

Belphegur, who is reckoned the second in dignity that fell, and is in the first book the second that awakens out of the trance, and confers with Satan upon the situation of their affairs, maintains his rank in the book now before us. There is a wonderful Majesty described in his rising up to speak. He acts as a kind of moderator between the two opposite parties, and proposes a third undertaking, which the whole assemibly gives into. The motion he makes of detaching one of their body in search of a new world is grounded upon a project devised by Satan, and curiously proposed by him in the following lines of the first Book.

Space may produce New worlds, whereas so rise
There went a fame in Heav'n, that he ere long Intended to create, and therein plant
A generation, whom his choice regard
Should favour equal to the sons of Heav'n:
This he, if but to pray, shall be perhaps
Our first eruption, this or elsewhere:
For this infernal Pit shall never hold Celestial Spirits in bondage, nor the Abyss
Long under darkness cover. But these thoughts Full counsel must mature:

It is on this project that Belphegur grounds his proposal.

What if we find
Some easier enterprise? There is a place
(If ancient and prophetic fame in Heav'n Err not) another world, the happy seat
Of some new race call'd Mankind, about this time
To be created like to us, though less
In power and excellence, but favour'd more

Of:
Of him who rules above; so was his will Pronounced among the Gods, and by an oath,
That Heav'n's whole circumference, confirm'd.

The Reader may observe how just it was, not to omit in the first book the project upon which the whole Poem turns: as also that the Prince of the fallen Angels was the only proper person to give it birth, and that he next to him in dignity was the fittest to support it.

There is besides, I think, something wonderfully beautiful, and very apt to affect the Reader's imagination, in this antient prophecy or report in Heaven, concerning the Creation of man. Nothing could shew more the dignity of the species, than this tradition which ran of them before their existence. They are represented to have been the Talk of Heaven, before they were created. Virgil, in compliment to the Roman Common-wealth, makes the Heroes of it appear in their state of pre-existence;
but Milton does a far greater honour to mankind in general, as he gives us a glimpse of them even before they are in Being.

The rising of this great assembly is described in a very sublime and poetical manner:

Their rising all at once was as the sound
Of Thunder heard remote—

The Diversions of the fallen Angels, with the particular account of their place of habitation, are described with great pregnancy of thought, and copiousness of invention. The Diversions are every way suitable to Beings who had nothing left them but strength and knowledge misap-p lied. Such are their contentions at the race, and in feats of arms, with their entertainment in the following lines.

Others with vast Typhean rage more fell
Rend up both rocks and hills, and ride the air
In whirlwind; Hell scarce holds the wild uproar.

Their Music is employed in celebrating their own criminal exploits, and their Discourse in 'founding the unathomable depths of fate, free-will,
and fore-knowledge.

The several circumstances in the description of Hell are finely imagined:
as the four rivers which digorge themselves into the sea of fire, the ex-trems of cold and heat, and the river of oblivion. The monstrous animals produced in that infernal world are represented by a single line, which gives us a more horrid Idea of them, than a much longer description would have done.

Nature
Nature breeds,

Perverse, all monstrous, all prodigious things,
Abominable, inutterable, and worse
Than Fables yet have feign'd, or Fear conceiv'd, Gorgons, and Hydra's, and Chimera's dire.

This Episode of the fallen Spirits, and their place of habitation, comes in very happily to unbend the mind of the Reader from its attention to the debate. An ordinary Poet would indeed have spun out so many circumstances to a great length, and by that means have weakened, instead of illustrated, the principal Fable.

The flight of Satan to the gates of hell is finely imagined.

I have already declared my opinion of the Allegory concerning Sin and Death, which is however a very finished Piece in its kind, when it is not considered as a part of an Epic Poem. The Genealogy of the several persons is contrived with great delicacy. Sin is the daughter of Satan, and Death the off-spring of Sin. The incestuous mixture between Sin and Death produces those Monstrous and Hell-hounds which from time to time enter into their Mother, and rear the bowels of her who gave them birth. These are the Terrors of an evil Conscience, and the proper fruits of Sin, which naturally rife from the apprehensions of Death.
This last beautiful Moral is, I think, clearly intimated in the speech of Sin, where complaining of this her dreadful illfate, she adds,

Before mine eyes in opposition fits Grim Death thy son and foe, who filets them on.
And me his Parent would full soon devour
For want of other prey, but that he knows
His end with mine involv'd

I need not mention to the Reader the beautiful Circumstance in the last part of this quotation. He will likewise observe how naturally the three persons concerned in this Allegory are tempted by one common interest to enter into a confederacy together, and how properly Sin is made the Portrait of hell, and the only Being that can open the gates to that world of Tortures.

The descriptive part of this Allegory is likewise very strong, and full of sublime Ideas. The figure of Death, the Regal Crown upon his head, his menace of Satan, his advancing to the combat, the Outcry at his birth, are circumstances too noble to be past over in silence, and extremely extremely suitable to this King of Terrors. I need not mention the justness of thought which is observed in the Generation of these several Symbollical Personns, that Sin was produced upon the first Revolt of Satan, that Death appeared soon after he was cast into hell, and that the Terrors of Conficence were conceived at the gate of this place of torments. The description of the Gates is very poetical, as the opening of them is full of Milton's Spirit.

--- On a sudden open she
With impetuous recoil and jarring sound
The infernal doors, and on their hinges grate
Harsh thunder, that the lowest bottom shook
Of Erebus. She open'd, but to shout
Exceed'd her power; the Gates wide open stood,
That with extended wings a banner'd host
Under spread ensigns marching might pass through
With horse and chariots rank'd in loose array;
So wide they stood, and like a furnace mouth
Cast forth redounding smok and ruddy flame.

In Satan's voyage through the Chaos, there are several imaginary Personns described, as residing in that immense waste of Matter. This may perhaps be conformable to the Taste of those Critics who are pleas'd with nothing in a Poet which has not Life and Manners ascribed to it; but for my own part I am pleas'd most with those Passages in this description which carry in them a greater measure of probability, and are such as might possibly have happened. Of this kind is his first mounting in the Smoak, that rises from the infernal Pit, his falling into a cloud of Nitre, and the like combustible materials, that by their explosion still hurried him forward in his voyage; his springing upward like a pyramid of fire, with his laborious Passage through that Confusion of Elements, which the Poet calls

The Womb of Nature and perhaps her Grave.

The glimmering Light which shot into the Chaos from the utmost verge of the Creation, with the distant discovery of the Earth that hung close by the Moon, are wonderfully beautiful and poetical.

Saturday,
Horace advises a Poet to consider thoroughly the nature and force of his Genius. Milton seems to have known perfectly well wherein his strength lay, and has therefore chosen a subject entirely conformable to those talents of which he was master. As his Genius was wonderfully turned to the Sublime, his Subject is the noblest that could have entered into the thoughts of man. Every thing that is truly Great and Astonishing has a place in it. The whole systeme of the intellectual world; the Chaos, and the Creation; Heaven, Earth and Hell; enter into the constitution of his Poem.

Having in the first and second book represented the Infernal world with all its horrors, the thread of his Fable naturally leads him into the opposite regions of bliss and glory.

If Milton's majesty takes him any where, it is in those parts of his poem, where the divine Persons are introduced as Speakers. One may, I think, observe that the Author proceeds with a kind of fear and trembling, whilst he describes the sentiments of the Almighty. He dares not give his imagination its full play, but confines to confine himself to such thoughts as are drawn from the books of the most orthodox divines, and to such expressions as may be met with in Scripture. The beauties, therefore, which we are to look for in these speeches, are not of a poetical nature, nor so proper to fill the mind with sentiments of Grandeur, as with thoughts of Devotion. The passions, which they are designed to raise, are a divine Love and religious Fear. The particular beauty of the speeches in the third book consists in that Simplicity and Perpetuity of title, in which the Poet has couched the greatest mysteries of Christianity, and drawn together, in a regular scheme, the whole dispensation of Providence, with respect to man. He has represented all the abstract doctrines.

doctrines of Predestination, Free-will, and Grace, as also the great points of the incarnation and Redemption, (which naturally grow up in a Poem that treats of the Fall of man,) with great energy of expression, and in a clearer and stronger light than ever I met with in any other Writer. As these points are dry in themselves to the generality of Readers, the concise and clear manner in which he has treated them is very much to be admired, as is likewise that particular art which he has made use of, in the interweaving of all those graces of Poetry, which the subject was capable of receiving.

The survey of the whole Creation, and of every thing that is transcended in it, is a prospect worthy of Omniscience; and as much above that, in which Virgil has drawn his Jupiter, as the Christian idea of the supreme Being is more rational and sublime than that of the heathens. The particular objects on which he is described to have cast his eye, are represented in the most beautiful and lively manner.

Now had th' Almighty Father from above,
From the pure empyrean where he sits
High thron'd above all height, beat down his eye,
His own works and their works at once to view.
About him all the sanctities of heaven
Stood thick as stars, and from his sight receiv'd
Boa'titude past utterance: on his right
The radiant Image of his Glory sat,
His only Son; on earth he first beheld
Our two first Parents, yet the only two
Of Mankind, in the happy Garden plac'd,
Reaping immortal fruits of joy and love,
Uninterrupted joy, unceas'd love,
In blissful solitude: he then survey'd
Hell and the gulf between, and Satan there Coasting the wall of heav'n on this side night
In the dim air sublime, and ready now
To float with wearied wings and willing feet
On the bare outside of this world, that seem'd
Firm and impos'd without firmament,
Uncertain which, in ocean or in air.
Him God beholding from his prospect high,
Wherein past, present, future he beholds;
Tends to his only Son foreseeing Spake.
Satan's approach to the confines of the Creation, is finely image'd in the beginning of the speech, which immediately follows: The effects of this speech in the blessed Spirits, and in the divine Person to whom it was addresed, cannot but fill the mind of the Reader with a secret pleasure and complacency.

Thus while God spake, ambrosial fragrance fill'd
All heart's, and in the blessed spirits slept,
Suns of new joy inestible diffus'd!
Beyond compare the Son of God was seen
Most glorious, in him all his Father shone
Substantially express'd, and in his face
Divine compassion visibly appear'd,
Love without end, and without measure grace.

I need not point out the beauty of that circumstance, wherein the whole host of Angels are represent'd as standing mute; nor show how proper the occasion was to produce such a silence in heaven. The close of this divine Colloquy, with the Hymn of Angels that follows upon it, are so wonderfully beautiful and poetical, that I should not forbear inserting the whole passage, if the bounds of my paper would give me leave.

No sooner had th'Almighty ceased, but all
The multitudes of Angels with a shout,
Loud as from numbers without number, sweet
As from brief voices, uttering joy, heart's rugh
With jubilee, and loud Hosanna's fill'd Th'eternal regions; &c.,

Satan's walk upon the outside of the Universe, which, at a distance, appeared to him of a globular form, but, upon his nearer approach, looked like an unbounded plain, is natural and noble. As his roaming upon the frontiers of the Creation, between that mass of matter, which was wrought into a world, and that shapeless unformed heap of materials, which still lay in Chaos and Confusion, strikes the imagination with something astonishingly great and wild. I have before spoken of the Limbo of Vanity, which the Poet places upon this uttermost surface of the Universe, and shall here explain my self more at large on that, and other parts of the Poem, which are of the same shadowy nature.
Aristotle observes, that the Fable in an Epic Poem should abound in circumstances that are both Credible and Astonishing; or, as the French Critics chuse to phrase it, the Fable should be filled with the Probable and the Marvellous. This rule is as fine and just as any in Aristotle's whole Art of Poetry.

If the Fable is only Probable, it differs nothing from a true History; if it is only Marvellous, it is no better than a romance. The great secret, therefore, of Heroic Poetry, is to relate such circumstances, as may produce in the Reader at the same time both Belief and Astonishment. This is brought to pass in a well-chosen Fable, by the account of such things as have really happened, or at least of such things as have happened according to the received opinions of mankind. Milton's Fable is a master-piece of this nature; as the war in Heaven, the condition of the fallen Angels, the state of Innocence, the temptation of the Serpent, and the Fall of man, though they are very Astonishing in themselves, are not only Credible, but actual points of Faith.

The next method of reconciling Miracles with Credibility, is by a happy invention of the Poet; as in particular, when he introduces agents of a superior nature, who are capable of effecting what is wonderful, and what is not to be met with in the ordinary course of things. Ulysses's ship being turn'd into a rock, and Aeneas's fleet into a shoal of water-nymphs, though they are very Surprizing accidents, are nevertheless Probable, when we are told that they were the Gods who thus transformed them. It is this kind of machinery which fills the Poems both of Homer and Virgil with such circumstances as are Wonderful, but not Impossible, and so frequently produce in the Reader the most pleasing passion that can rife in the mind of man, which is Admiration. If there be any instance in the Aeneid liable to exception upon this account, it is in the beginning of the third book, where Aeneas is represented as tearing up the Myrtle that dropped blood. To qualify this wonderful circumstance, Polydorus tells a story from the root of the Myrtle, that the barbarous inhabitants of the country having pierced him with spears and arrows, the wood which was left in his body took root in his wounds, and gave birth to that bleeding tree. This circumstance seems to have the Marvellous without the Probable, because it is represented as proceeding from natural causes, without the interposition of any God, or rather supernatural power capable of producing it: the spears and arrows grow of themselves, without so much as the modern help of an enchantment. If we look into the Fiction of Milton's fable, though we find it full full of Surprising incidents, they are generally suited to our notions of the things and persons described, and tempered with a due measure of Probability. I must only make an exception to the Limbo of Vanity, with his Episode of Sin and Death, and some of the imaginary persons in his Chaos. These passages are Astonishing, but not Credible; the Reader cannot so far impose upon himself as to see a Possibility in them; they are the description of dreams and shadows, not of things or persons.

I know that many Critics look upon the stories of Circe, Polyphemus, the Sirens, nay the whole Odyssey and Iliad to be Allegories; but allowing this to be true, they are fables, which, considering the opinions of mankind that prevailed in the age of the Poets, might possibly have been according to the letter. The persons are such as might have acted what is ascribed to them, as the circumstances, in which they are represented, might possibly have been truths and realities. This Appearance of Probability is so absolutely requisite in the greater kinds of Poetry, that Arieul observes the ancient Tragic writers made use of the names of such great men as had actually lived in the world, though the Tragedy proceeded upon adventures they were never engaged in, on purpose to make the subject more Credible. In a word, besides the hidden meaning of an Epic Allegory, the plain literal sense ought to appear Probable. The story should be such as an ordinary Reader may acquiesce in, whatever natural, moral, or political truth may be discovered in it by men of greater penetration.

Satan, after having long wandered upon the surface, or utmost wall of the Universe, discovers at last a wide gap in it, which led into the Creation, and is described as the Opening through which the Angels pass to and fro into the lower world, upon their errands to mankind. His sitting upon the brink of this passage, and taking a survey of the whole face of nature, that appeared to him new and fresh in all its beauties, with the Simile illustrating this circumstance, fills the mind of the Reader with so surprising and glorious an Idea as any that arises in the whole Poem. He looks down into that vast hollow of the Universe with the eye, or (as Milton calls it in his first book) with the ken of an Angel. He surveys all the wonders in this immense Amphitheatre that lie between both the poles of Heaven, and takes in at one view the whole round of the Creation.

His flight between the several worlds that shined on every side of him, with the particular description of the Sun, are set forth in all the wantonness of a luxuriant imagination. His shape, speech and behaviour upon upon his transforming himself into an Angel of light, are touched with exquisite beauty. The Poet's thought of directing Satan to the Sun, which in the vulgar opinion of mankind is the most conspicuous part of the Creation, and the placing in it an Angel, is a circumstance very finely contrived, and the more adjusted to a poetical Probability, as it was a received doctrine among the most famous Philosophers, that every Orb had its Intelligences; and as an Apostle in sacred Writ is said to have seen such an Angel in the Sun. In the answer which this Angel returns to the dignified evil Spirit, there is such a becoming Majesty as is altogether suitable to a superior Being. The part of it in which he represents himself as present at the Creation, is very noble in itself, and not only proper where it is introduced, but requisite to prepare the Reader for what follows in the seventh book.

I saw when at his word the formless mass,
This world's material mould, came to a heap:
Confusion heard his voice, and wild uproar
Stand rul'd, flood vast infinitude confin'd;
Till at his second bidding darkness fled,
Light shone, &c.

In the following part of the speech he points out the Earth with such circumstances, that the Reader can scarce forbear fancying himself employed on the same distant view of it.

Look downward on the Globe, whose bitter side
With light from hence, who' but reflected, shines;
That place is Earth, the seat of Man, that light
His day, &c.

I must not conclude my reflections upon this third book of Paradise Lost, without taking notice of that celebrated complaint of Milton with which it opens, and which certainly deserves all the praises that have been given to it; though, as I have before hinted, it may rather be looked upon as an Excrecence, than as an Essential part of the Poem. The same observation might be applied to that beautiful digression upon Hypocrifies in the same book.

Saturday,
THOSE, who know how many volumes have been written on the Poems of Horace and Virgil, will easily pardon the length of my discourse upon Milton. The Paradise Lost is looked upon, by the best judges, as the greatest production, or at least the noblest work of Genius, in our language, and therefore deserves to be set before an English reader in its full beauty. For this reason, though I have endeavoured to give a general idea of its Graces and Imperfections in my fix first papers, I thought it necessary to bestow one upon every book in particular. The three first books I have already dispatched, and am now entering upon the fourth. I need not acquaint my Reader, that there are multitudes of beauties in this great Author, especially in the descriptive parts of his Poem, which I have not touched upon; it being my intention to point out those only, which appear to me the most exquisite, or those which are not so obvious to ordinary Readers. Every one that has read the Critics, who have written upon the Odyssey, the Iliad, and the Aeneid, knows very well, that though they agree in their opinions of the great beauties in those Poems, they have nevertheless each of them discovered several master-strokes, which have escaped the observation of the rest. In the same manner, I question not but any writer, who shall treat on this subject after me, may find several beauties in Milton, which I have not taken notice of. I must likewise observe, that as the greatest masters of critical learning differ among one another, as to some particular points in an Epic Poem, I have not bound my self scrupulously to the rules which any one of them has laid down upon that art, but have taken the liberty sometimes to join with one, and sometimes with another, and sometimes to differ from all of them, when I have thought that the reason of the thing was on my side.
We may consider the beauties of the fourth book under three heads: In the first are those Pictures of Still-life, which we meet with in the descriptions of Eden, Paradise, Adam’s bower, &c. In the next are the Machines, which comprehend the speeches and behaviour of the good and bad Angels. In the last is the Conduct of Adam and Eve, who are the principal Actors in the Poem.

In the description of Paradise, the Poet has observed Aristotle’s rule of lavishing all the ornaments of diction on the weak unactive parts of the fable, which are not supported by the beauty of sentiments and characters. Accordingly the Reader may observe, that the Expressions are more florid and elaborate in these descriptions, than in most other parts of the Poem. I must further add, that though the Drawings of gardens, rivers, rainbows, and the like dead pieces of nature, are justly confided in an Heroic Poem, when they run out into an unnecessary length; the description of Paradise would have been faulty, had not the Poet been very particular in it, not only as it is the Scene of the principal Action, but as it is requisite to give us an idea of that Happiness from which our first Parents fell. The plan of it is wonderfully beautiful, and formed upon the short sketch which we have of it in holy writ. Milton’s exuberance of imagination has poured forth such a redundancy of ornaments on this seat of happiness and innocence, that it would be endless to point out each particular.

I must not quit this head, without further observing, that there is scarce a speech of Adam or Eve in the whole Poem, wherein the sentiments and allusions are not taken from this their delightful habitation. The Reader, during their whole course of Action, always finds himself in the walks of Paradise. In short, as the Critics have remarked, that in those Poems, wherein Shepherds are Actors, the thoughts ought always to take a tincture from the woods, fields and rivers; so we may observe, that our first parents seldom lose sight of their happy station in any thing they speak or do; and, if the Reader will give me leave to use the expression, that their thoughts are always paradisical.

We are in the next place to consider the Machines of the fourth book. Satan being now within prospect of Eden, and looking round upon the glories of the creation, is filled with sentiments different from those which he discovered whilst he was in Hell. The place inspires him with thoughts more adapted to it: he reflects upon the happy condition from whence he fell, and breaks forth into a speech that is softened with several transient touches of remorse and self-accusation; but at length, he confirms firms himself in impenitence, and in his design of drawing men into his own state of guilt and misery. This conflict of passions is raised with a great deal of art, as the opening of his speech to the Sun is very bold and noble.

O thou that with surpassing glory crown'd
Look'd from thy sole dominion like the God
Of this new world, at whose sight all the Stars
Hide their diminish'd heads, so thee I call
But with no friendly voice, and add thy name
O Sun, to tell thee how I hate thy beams,
That bring to my remembrance from what state
I fell, how glorious once above thy sphere.

This speech is, I think, the finest that is ascribed to Satan in the whole Poem. The evil spirit afterwards proceeds to make his discoveries concerning our first parents, and to learn after what manner they may be best attacked. His bounding over the walls of Paradise; his sitting in the shade of cormorant upon the tree of life, which stood in the center of it, and over-topped all the other trees of the garden; his alighting among the herd of animals, which are so beautifully represented as playing about Adam and Eve; together with his transforming himself into different shapes, in order to hear their conversation; are circumstances that give an agreeable surprize to the reader, and are devised with great art, to connect that series of adventures in which the Poet has engaged this great artificer of fraud.

The thought of Satan's transformation into a cormorant, and placing himself on the tree of life, seems raised upon that passage in the Iliad, where two deities are described, as perching on the top of an oak in the shade of vultures.

His planting himself at the ear of Eve under the form of a toad, in order to produce vain dreams and imaginations, is a circumstance of the same nature; as his starting up in his own form is wonderfully fine, both in the literal description, and in the moral which is concealed under it. His answer upon his being discovered, and demanded to give an account of himself, is conformable to the pride and intrepidity of his character.

Know ye not then, said Satan, fill'd with scorn,
Know ye not me? ye knew me once no mate
For you, there sitting where you durst not fear:

Vol. III.

The
Not to know me argues your selves unknown,
The lowest of your throng;
Zeophon's rebuke, with the influence it had on Satan, is exquisitely graceful and moral. Satan is afterwards led away to Gabriel, the chief of the guardian Angels, who kept watch in Paradise. His disdainful behaviour on this occasion is so remarkable a beauty, that the most ordinary reader cannot but take notice of it. Gabriel's discovering his approach at a distance, is drawn with great strength and vivacities of imagination.

O friends, I bear the tread of nimble feet
Hasting this way, and now by glimps discern Ithuriel and Zeophon through the shade;
And with them comes a third of regal port,
But faded splendor was, who by his gait
And fierce demeanor seats the Prince of Hell,
Not likely to part hence without contest;
Stand firm, for in his look distance furs.

The conference between Gabriel and Satan abounds with sentiments proper for the occasion, and suitable to the persons of the two speakers. Satan's cloathing himself with Terror, when he prepares for the combat, is truly sublime, and at least equal to Homer's description of Discord celebrated by Longinus, or to that of Fame in Virgil, who are both represented with their feet flading upon the earth, and their heads reaching above the clouds.

While thus he spake, th' angelic squadrou bright
Turn'd fiery red, sharpening in mooned burnes.
Their phalanx, and began to hem him round
With pointed spears, &c.
—On th' other side, Satan alarm'd,
Collecting all his might dilated stood
Like Tenariff or Atlas unremov'd.
His stature reach'd the sky, and on his crest
Saw Horror blan'd—

I must here take notice, that Milton is every where full of hints and sometimes literal translations, taken from the greatest of the Greek and Latin Poets. But this I may reserve for a discourse by itself, because I would not break the thread of these Speculations, that are designed for English readers, with such reflections as would be of no use but to the Learned.

I must however observe in this place, that the breaking off the combat between Gabriel and Satan, by the drawing out of the golden Scales in heaven, is a refinement upon Homer's thought, who tells us, that before the battle between Hector and Achilles, Jupiter weighed the event of it in a pair of scales. The reader may see the whole passage in the 2nd Iliad.

Virgil, before the last decisive combat, describes Jupiter in the same manner, as weighing the fates of Turnus and Aeneas. Milton, though he took this beautiful circumstance from the Iliad and Aeneid, does not only insert it as a poetical Embellishment, like the Authors above-mentioned; but makes an artful use of it for the proper carrying on of his Fable, and for the breaking off the combat between the two warriors, who were upon the point of engaging. To this we may further add, that Milton is the more justified in this passage, as we find the same noble Allegory in holy writ, where a wicked Prince, some few hours before he was assaulted and slain, is said to have been weighed in the scales, and to have been found wanting.

I must here take notice, under the head of the Machines, that Uriel's gliding down to the earth upon a sun-beam, with the Poet's device to make him descend, as well in his return to the Sun, as in his coming from it, is a prettiness that might have been admired in a little fanciful Poet, but seems below the Genius of Milton. The description of the Host of armed Angels walking their nightly round in Paradise, is of another spirit:

So saying, on he led his radiant files,
Dazzling the Moon;

as that account of the Hymns, which our first Parents used to hear them singing in these their midnight walks, is altogether divine, and inexpressibly amazing to the imagination.

We are, in the last place, to consider the parts which Adam and Eve act in the fourth book. The description of them as they first appeared to Satan, is exquisitely drawn, and sufficient to make the fallen Angel gaze upon them with all that Astonishment, and those emotions of Envy, in which he is represented.
Two of far nobler shape eret & tall,
God-like eret, with native honour clad.
In naked majesty seem'd lords of all.
And worthy seem'd, for in their looks divine
The image of their glorious Maker shone.
Truth, wisdom, sanctitude severe and pure;
Severe, but in true filial freedom plac'd:
For contemplation he and colour form'd,
For softness she and sweet attractive grace;
He for God only, she for God in him:
His fair large front, and eye sublime declar'd
Absolute rule; and hyacinthine locks
Round from his parted forelock manly hung Cloistering, but not beneath his shoulders broad:
She at a veil drawn to her slender waist
Her unadorned golden tresses wore Disho'weled, but in wanton ringlets wav'd.
So pass'd they naked on, nor smil'd the sight
Of God or Angels, for they thought no ill:
So hand in hand they pass'd, the loveliest pair
That ever since in loves embraces met.

There is a fine spirit of Poetry in the Lines which follow, wherein they are described as sitting on a bed of flowers by the side of a fountain, and midst a mixed assembly of animals.

The speeches of these two first Lovers flow equally from passion and sincerity. The professions they make to one another are full of warmth; but at the same time founded on truth. In a word, they are the Gallan tries of Paradise.

——When Adam first of Men——
Soe partner and sole part of all these joys Dearer thy self than all:——
But let us ever praise him, and exult
His bounty, following our delightful task,
To prune these growing plants and tend these flowers,
Which were it alone, yet with thee were sweet.
To whom thus Eve reply'd, O thou for whom
And from whom I was form'd, fields of thy fields,
And without whom am to no end, my guide

And
And hear, what thou hast said is just and right.
For so to him indeed all praises owe
And daily thanks, I chiefly who enjoy
So far the happier lot, enjoying thee
Preeminent by so much odds, while thou
Like comfort to thy self canst no where find, &c.

The remaining part of Eve's speech, in which she gives an account of her self upon her first creation, and the manner in which she was brought to Adam, is I think as beautiful a passage as any in Milton, or perhaps in any other Poet whatsoever. These passages are all worked off with so much art, that they are capable of pleasing the most delicate Reader, without offending the most severe.

That day I oft remember, when from sleep, &c.

A Poet of less judgment and invention than this great Author, would have found it very difficult to have filled these tender parts of the Poem with sentiments proper for a state of Innocence; to have described the warmth of love, and the professions of it, without artifice or hyperbole; to have made the Man speak the most endearing things, without depending from his natural dignity, and the Woman receiving them without departing from the modesty of her character; in a word, to adjust the prerogatives of Wisdom and Beauty, and make each appear to the other in its proper force and loveliness. This mutual subordination of the two sexes is wonderfully kept up in the whole Poem, as particularly in the speech of Eve I have before-mentioned, and upon the conclusion of it in the following lines.

So spake our general mother, and with eyes
Of conjugal attraction unstropp'd,
And meek surrender, half embracing lean'd
On our first father, half her swelling breast
Naked met his under the flowing gold
Of her loose tresses bind'd: he in delight
Both of her beauty and submissive charms.
Smil'd with superiour love,

The Poet adds, that the Devil turned away with envy at the sight of so much happiness.

We
We have another view of our first Parents in their evening discourses, which is full of pleasing images and sentiments suitable to their condition and characters. The speech of Eve, in particular, is dressed up in such a soft and natural turn of words and sentiments, as cannot be sufficiently admired.

I shall close my reflections upon this book, with observing the masterly transition which the Poet makes to their evening worship, in the following lines:

Thus at their jadie lodge arriv'd, both stood,
Both turn'd, and under open sky ador'd
The God that made both sky, air, earth and heaven,
Which they beheld, the Moon's resplendent globe
And starry Pole: Thou also mad'st the night,
Maker omnipotent, and thou the day, &c.

Most of the modern heroic Poets have imitated the Ancients, in beginning a speech without premissing, that the person said thus or thus; but as it is easy to imitate the Ancients in the omission of two or three words, it requires judgment to do it in such a manner as they shall not be missed; and that the speech may begin naturally without them. There is a fine instance of this kind out of Homer, in the twenty third Chapter of Longinus.

--- Major rerum mibi nascitur ordo. Virg.

We were told in the foregoing book how the evil spirit prevailed upon Eve as she lay asleep, in order to inspire her with thoughts of vanity, pride and ambition. The Author, who shews a wonderful art throughout his whole Poem, in preparing the Reader for the several occurrences that arise in it, founds upon the above-mentioned circumstance the first part of the fifth book. Adam upon his awaking finds Eve still asleep, with an unusual discomposure in her looks. The posture tire in which he regards her; is described with a tenderness not to be expressed, as the Whisper with which he awakens her; is the softest that ever was conveyed to a Lover's ear.

His wonder was to find unawaken'd Eve
With treffes discompos'd, and glowing cheek,
As thro' unquiet rest: he on his side
Leaning half rais'd, with looks of cordial love,
Hung over her enamour'd, and beheld
Beauty, which whether waking or asleep,
Sbor forth peculiar Graces; then with voice
Mild, as when Zephyrus on Flora breathes,
Her hand soft touching, whisper'd thus: Awake
My fairest, my espous'd, my latest found,
Heaven's last best gift, my ever new delight.
Awake; the morning shines, and the fresh field
Calls us, we lose the prime, ro mark how spring
Our tended Plants, bow blows the Citron grove,
What drops the Myrrh, and what the balmu Reed,
How Nature paints her colours, how the Bee
Sits on the bloom, extracting liquid sweet.
Such whispering wak'd her, but with startled eye.
On Adam, whom embracing, thus she spake:
O sole in whom my thoughts find all repose,
My glory, my perfection, glad I see Thy face, and worn return'd——

I cannot but take notice that Milton, in the conference between Adam and Eve, had his eye very frequently upon the book of Canticles, in which there is a noble spirit of eastern Poetry; and very often not unlike what we meet with in Homer, who is generally placed near the age of Solomon. I think there is no question but the Poet in the preceding speech remember'd those two parables which are spoken on the like occasion, and fill'd with the same picaug-images of Nature.

My beloved spake, and said unto me, Rise up, my Love, my fair-one, and come away; for lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land. The fig-tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smelk. Arise, my Love, my fair-one, and come away.

Come,
Come, my beloved, let us go forth into the field; let us get up early to the vineyards, let us see if the vines flourish, whether the tender grape appear, and the pomegranates bud forth.

His preferring the garden of Eden to that,

——Where the sapient King
    Held dalliance with his fair Egyptian spouse, shews that the Poet had this delightful scene in his mind.

Eve's Dream is full of those high conceits engendering pride, which, we are told, the Devil endeavoured to infill into her. Of this kind is that part of it where she fancies her self awakened by Adam in the following beautiful lines.

Why sleep'st thou Eve? now is the pleasant time,
The cool, the silent, faire where silence yields
To the night-warbling bird, that now awake
Tunes sweeter; his love-labour'd song, now reigns Full-orb'd the Moon, and with more pleasing light
Shadowy sets off the face of things; in vain,
If none regard. Heaven wakes with all his eyes,
Whom to behold but thee, Nature's desire,
In whose sight all things joy, with ravishment,
Attracted by thy beauty, still to gaze!

An injudicious Poet would have made Adam talk through the whole work, in such sentiments as these: but flattery and falsehood are not the courtship of Milton's Adam, and could not be heard by Eve in her state of Innocence, excepting only in a Dream produced on purpose to taint her Imagination. Other vain sentiments of the same kind in this relation of her Dream, will be obvious to every reader. Though the Catastrophe of the Poem is finely prefaged on this occasion, the particulars of it are so artfully shadowed, that they do not anticipate the story which follows in the ninth book. I shall only add, that though the vision of it self is founded upon truth, the circumstances of it are full of that wildness and inconsistency which are natural to a Dream. Adam, conformable to his superior character for wisdom, instructs and comforts Eve upon this occasion.

So clear'd he his fair spouse, and she was clear'd,
    But silently a gentle tear let fall.

From
From either eye, and wiped them with her hair;
Two other precious drops that ready stood,
Each in their crystal juice, be e'er they fell Kiss'd, as the gracious signs of sweet remorse
And pious awe, that fear'd to have offended.

The morning Hymn is written in imitation of one of those Psalms, where, in the overflowings of gratitude and praise, the Psalmist calls not only upon the Angels, but upon the most conspicuous parts of the inanimate Creation, to join with him in extolling their common Maker. Invocations of this nature fill the mind with glorious ideas of God's works, and awaken that divine enthusiasm, which is so natural to devotion. But if this calling upon the dead parts of Nature, is at all times a proper kind of worship, it was in a particular manner suitable to our first parents, who had the creation fresh upon their minds, and had not seen the various dispensations of Providence, nor consequently could be acquainted with those many topicks of praise which might afford matter to the devotions of their posterity. I need not remark the beautiful spirit of Poetry, which runs through this whole Hymn, nor the holiness of that resolution with which it concludes.

Having already mentioned those speeches which are aligned to the person in this poem, I proceed to the description which the Poet gives of Raphael. His departure from before the throne, and his flight through the choirs of Angels, is finely imaged. As Milton every where fills his Poem with circumstances that are marvellous and astonishing, he describes the gate of heaven as framed after such a manner, that it opened of itself upon the approach of the Angel who was to pass through it.

—— Till at the gate
Of Heav'n arriv'd, the gate self-open'd wide,
On golden hinges turning, as by work
Divine the sovereign architect had framed.

The Poet here seems to have regarded two or three passages in the 18th Idiad, as that in particular, where, speaking of Vulcan, Homer says, that he had made twenty Tripodes running on golden wheels; which, upon occasion, might go of themselves to the assembly of the Gods, and, when there was no more use for them, return again after the same manner. Scaliger has rallied Homer very severely upon this point, as M. Dacier has endeavoured to defend it. I will not pretend to determine, whether in this particular of Homer, the marvellous does not lose sight of the probable. As the miraculous workmanship of Milton’s gates is not so extraordinary as this of the Tripodes, so I am persuaded he would not have mentioned it, had not he been supported in it by a passage in the Scripture, which speaks of wheels in Heaven that had life in them, and moved of themselves, or stood still, in conformity with the Cherubims, whom they accompanied.

Vol. III.

Tr

There is no question but Milton had this circumstance in his thoughts, because in the following book he describes the chariot of the Messiah with living wheels, according to the plan in Ezekiel’s vision.

——Forth rush’d with whirring sound
The chariot of paternal Deity,
Flashing thick flames, wheel within wheel undrawn,
It self insinpt with Spirit——

I question not but Bossu, and the two Dacier, who are for vindicating every thing that is cenured in Homer, by something parallel in holy Writ, would have been very well pleased had they thought of confronting Vulcan’s Tripodes with Ezekiel’s wheels.

Raphael’s descent to the earth, with the figure of his person, is represented in very lively colours. Several of the French, Italian, and English Poets have given a loose to their imaginations in the description of Angels: but I do not remember to have met with any so finely drawn, and so conformable to the notions which are given of them in Scripture, as this in Milton. After having set him forth in all his heavenly plumage, and represented him as alighting upon the earth, the Poet concludes his description with a circumstance, which is altogether new, and imagined with the greatest strength of fancy.

——Like Maia’s son be flood,
And took his plumes, that heavenly fragrance fill’d
The circuit wide.—

Raphael’s reception by the guardian Angels; his passing through the wilderness of sweets; his distant appearance to Adam, have all the graces that Poetry is capable of bestowing. The Author afterwards gives us a particular description of Eve in her domestick employments.

So saying, with dispatchful looks in haste
She turns, on hospitable thoughts intent,
What choice to chose for delicacy best,
What order, so courtly’d, as not to mix.
Tales, not well join'd, inelegant, but bring Tale after tale, upheld with kindest change;
Bless'd her then, &c.

Though in this, and other parts of the same book, the subject is only the doubtful of our first parent, it is set off with so many pleasing images and strong expressions, as make it none of the least agreeable parts in this divine work.

The natural majesty of Adam, and at the same time his submissive behaviour to the superior Being, who had vouchsafed to be his guide; the solemn Hail which the Angel beffows upon the Mother of mankind, with the figure of Eve miniftring at the table, are circumstances which deserve to be admired.

Raphael's behaviour is every way suitable to the dignity of his nature, and to that character of a sociable spirit, with which the Author has so judiciously introduced him. He had received instructions to converse with Adam, as one friend converses with another, and to warn him of the enemy, who was contriving his destruction: accordingly he is represented as sitting down at a table with Adam, and eating of the fruits of Parrade. The occasion naturally leads him to his discourse on the food of Angels. After having thus entered into conversation with man upon more indifferent subjects, he warns him of his obedience, and makes a natural transition to the history of that fallen Angel, who was employed in the circumvention of our first Parents.

Had I followed Monsieur Bossu's method in my first paper on Milton,
I should have dated the action of Paradise Lost from the beginning of Raphael's speech in this book, as he supposes the action of the Aeneid to begin in the second book of that Poem. I could allude many reasons for my drawing the action of the Aeneid rather from its immediate beginning in the first book, than from its remote beginning in the second; and shew why I have considered the falling of Troy as an Episode, according to the common acception of that word. But as this would be a dry unentertaining piece of Criticism, and perhaps unnecessary to thos who have read my first paper, I shall not enlarge upon it. Which-ever of the notions be true, the unity of Milton's Action is preserved according to either of them; whether we consider the Fall of man in its immediate beginning, as proceeding from the resolutions taken in the Infernal COUN-ch, or in its more remote beginning, as proceeding from the first revolt of the Angels in heaven. The occasion which Milton assigns for this revolt, as it is founded on hints in Holy Writ, and on the opinion of some

some great writers, so it was the most proper that the Poet could have made use of.

The Revolt in heaven is described with great force of imagination, and a fine variety of circumstances. The learned Reader cannot but be pleased with the Poet’s imitation of Homer in the last of the following lines.

At length into the limits of the North
They came, and Satan took his royal seat
High on a hill, far blazing, as a mount Rais’d on a mount, with pyramids and towers
From diamond quarries beam’d, and rocks of gold,
The Palace of great Lucifer, (so call
That structure in the dialect of men Interpreted)

Homer mentions persons and things, which he tells us in the language of the Gods are called by different names from these they go by in the language of men. Milton has imitated him with his usual judgment in this particular place, wherein he has likewise the authority of Scripture to justify him. The part of Abdiel, who was the only Spirit that in this infinite host of Angels preferred his Allegiance to his Maker, exhibits to us a noble moral of religious Singularity. The zeal of the Seraph breaks forth in a becoming warmth of sentiments and expressions, as the character which is given us of him denotes that generous scorn and intrepidity which attends heroic virtue.; The Author doubtless designed it as a pattern to those who live among mankind in their present state of degeneracy and corruption.

So spake the Seraph Abdiel, faithful found Among the faithfuls, faithful only he;
Among innumerable false, unmoved;
Unshaken, unMOVED, untir’d;
His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal;
Not number, nor example with him wrought:
To sue from truth, or change his constant mind;
Though single. From among them forth he pass’d,
Long way through hostile storm, which he sustained
Superior, nor of violence fear’d aught;
And with resorted from his back he turn’d
On those proud towers to swift destruction doom’d.

Saturday,
WE are now entering upon the sixth book of Paradise Lost, in which the Poet describes the battle of Angels; having raised his reader's expectation, and prepared him for it by several passages in the preceding books. I omitted quoting these passages in my observations on the former books, having purposely reserved them for the opening of this, the subject of which gave occasion to them. The Author's imagination was so inflamed with this great scene of Action, that wherever he speaks of it, he rises, if possible, above himself. Thus where he mentions Satan in the beginning of his Poem:

-----Vocat in certamine divos. Virg.

We have likewise several noble hints of it in the infernal conference.

O Prince, O Chief of many throne'd Powers,
That led th'imbat'te'd Seraphim to war,
Too well I see and rue the dire event,
That with sad overthrow, and foul defeat,
Hath lost us Heav'n, and all this mighty Host
In horrible destruction laid thus low,
But see the angry Victor has recall'd
His Ministers of vengeance and pursuit
Back to the gates of Heav'n: the sulphurous hail Shot after us in storm, overflow'd bath laid
The fiery surge, that from the precipice

Of
Of Heaven receiv'd us falling, and the thunder
Wing'd with red lightning and impecunious rage,
Perhaps hath spent his shafts, and ceases now
To bellow through the vast and boundless deep.

There are several other very sublime images on the same subject in the first book, as also in the second.

What when we fled again, pursued and strook
With Heaven's afflicting thunder, and besought
The deep to shelter us; this Hell then seemed
A refuge from those wounds—

In short, the Poet never mentions any thing of this battle but in such images of greatness and terror as are suitable to the subject. Among several others, I cannot forbear quoting that passage, where the Power, who is described as presiding over the Chaos, speaks in the third book.

Thou Satan; and him thus the Anarch old
With fault'ring speech, and visage incompos'd,
Answer'd, I know thee, stranger, who thou art,
That mighty leading Angel, who of late
Made head against Heaven's King, tho' overthrown.
I saw and heard; for such a numerous host Fled not in silence through the frighted deep
With ruin on ruin, rout on rout;
Confusion worse confounded; and Heaven's gates Pour'd out by millions her victorious bands Pursuing—

It required great pregnancy of invention, and strength of imagination, to fill this battle with such circumstances as should raise and astonish the mind of the reader; and at the same time an exactness of judgment, to avoid every thing that might appear light or trivial. Those who look into Homer, are surpriz'd to find his battles full rising one above another, and improving in horror, to the conclusion of the Iliad. Milton's fight of Angels is wrought up with the same beauty. It is ushered in with such signs of wrath, as are suitable to Omnipotence incensed. The first engagement is carried on under a cope of fire, occasioned by the flights of innumerable burning darts and arrows, which are discharged from either hoft. The second onset is still more terrible, as it is filled with those artificial thunders, which seem to make the victory doubtful, and produce a kind of conformation even in the good Angels. This is followed by the tearing up of mountains and promontories; 'till, in the last place, the Messiah comes forth in the fulness of majesty and terror. The pomp of his appearance, amidst the roarings of his thunders, the flashes of his chariot-wheels, is described with the utmost flights of human imagination.

There is nothing in the first and last day's engagement which does not appear natural, and agreeable enough to the ideas most readers would conceive of a fight between two armies of Angels.

The second day's engagement is apt to startle an imagination, which has not been raised and qualified for such a description, by the reading of the ancient Poets, and of Homer in particular. It was certainly a very bold thought in our author, to ascribe the first use of artillery to the rebel-Angels. But as such a pernicious invention may be well supposed to have proceeded from such authors, so it entered very properly into the thoughts of that Being, who is all along described as aspiring to the majesty of his maker. Such engines were the only instruments he could have made use of to imitate those thunders, that in all Poetry, both sacred and profane, are represented as the arms of the Almighty. The tearing up of the hills, was not altogether so daring a thought as the former. We are, in some measure, prepared for such an accident by the description of the Giant's war, which we meet with among the ancient Poets. What still made this circumstance the more proper for the Poet's use, is the opinion of many learned men, that the fable of the Giant's war, which makes so great a noise in antiquity, and gave birth to the sublimest description in Hesiod's works, was an allegory founded upon this very tradition of a fight between the good and bad Angels.

It may, perhaps, be worth while to consider with what judgment Milton, in this narration, has avoided every thing that is mean and trivial in the descriptions of the Latin and Greek Poets; and, at the same time, improved every great hint which he met with in their works upon this subject. Homer in that passage, which Longinus has celebrated for its sublimeness, and which Ovid and Virgil have copied after him, tells us, that the Giants threw Ossa upon Olympus, and Pelion upon Ossa. He adds an epithet to Pelion (Πηλιὼν), which very much swells the idea, by bringing up to the reader's imagination all the woods that grew upon it. There is further a great beauty in his singling out by name these three remarkable mountains, so well known to the Greeks. This last is such a beauty as the scene of Milton's war could not possibly furnish him with. with. Claudian, in his fragment upon the Giants war, has given full scope to that wildness of imagination which was natural to him. He tells us, that the Giants tore up whole islands by the roots, and threw them at the Gods. He describes one of them in particular taking up Leumnos in his arms, and whirling it to the skies, with all Vulcau's shop in the midst of it. Another tears up mount Ida, with the river Enipens, which ran down the sides of it; but the Poet, not content to describe him with this mountain upon his shoulders, tells us that the river flowed down his back, as he held it up in that posture. It is visible to every judicious reader, that such Ideas favour more of burlesque, than of the sublime. They proceed from a wantonness of imagination, and rather divert the mind than astonish it. Milton has taken every thing that is sublime in these several passages, and composes out of them the following great image.

From their foundations loosing to and fro,
They pluck'd the seated hills with all their load,
Rocks, waters, woods; and by the shaggy tops
Up-lifting bore them in their hands——

We have the full majesty of Homer in this short description, improved by the imagination of Claudian, without its puerilities.

I need not point out the description of the fallen Angels seeing the promontories hanging over their heads in such a dreadful manner, with the other numberless beauties in this book, which are so conspicuous, that they cannot escape the notice of the most ordinary reader.

There are indeed so many wonderful strokes of Poetry in this book, and such a variety of sublime Ideas, that it would have been impossible to have given them a place within the bounds of this paper. Besides that, I find it in a great measure done to my hand at the end of my Lord Roscommon's Essay on translated Poetry. I shall refer my Reader thither for some of the matter-strokes in the sixth book of Paradise Lost, though at the same time there are many others which that noble Author has not taken notice of.

Milton, notwithstanding the sublime genius he was master of, has in this book drawn to his assistance all the helps he could meet with among the antient Poets. The sword of Michael, which makes so great a havoc among the bad Angels, was given him, we are told, out of the armory of God.

——But the sword
Of Michael from the armory of God

Was
Was given him temper'd so, that neither keen
Nor solid might resist that edge, it met.
The sword of Satan with sleep force to smite Defending, and in half cut Sheer—

This passage is a copy of that in Virgil, wherein the Poet tells us, that the sword of Aeneas, which was given him by a Deity, broke into pieces the sword of Turnus, which came from a mortal forge. As the moral in this place is divine, so by the way we may observe, that the bellowing on a man who is favoured by heaven such an allegorical weapon, is very conformable to the old eastern way of thinking. Not only Homer has made use of it, but we find the Jewish Hero in the book of Maccabees, who had fought the battels of the chosen people with so much glory and success, receiving in his dream a sword from the hand of the Prophet Jeremiah. The following passage, wherein Satan is described as wounded by the sword of Michael, is in imitation of Homer.

The grating sword with discontinuous wound
Passed through him, but the ethereal substance clos'd
Not long divisible, and from the gash
A stream of nectarous humour issuing flow'd
Sanguine, such as celestial spirits may bleed,
And all his armour stain'd—

Homer tells us in the same manner, that upon Diomedes wounding the Gods, there flowed from the wound an Ieber, or pure kind of blood, which was not bred from mortal viands; and that though the pain was exquisitely great, the wound soon closed up and healed in those Beings who are vested with immortality.

I question not but Milton in his description of his furious Moloch flying from the battel, and bellowing with the wound he had received, had his eye on Mars in the Iliad; who, upon his being wounded, is represented as retiring out of the fight, and making an outcry louder than that of a whole army when it begins the charge. Homer adds, that the Greeks and Trojans, who were engaged in a general battel, were terrified on each side with the bellowing of this wounded Deity. The Reader will easily observe how Milton has kept all the horror of this image, without running into the ridicule of it.

Where the might of Gabriel fought,
And with fierce ensigns pierc'd the deep array
Vol. III. u

Of
Of Moloc furious King, who him defi'd,
And at his chariot-wheels to drag him bound Threaten'd, nor from the Holy One of Heaven
Refrain'd his tongue blasphemous; but anon
Down eleven to the waife, with shattered arms
And uncouth pain fled bellowing——

Milton has likewise raised his description in this book with many images taken out of the poetical parts of scripture. The Messiah's chariot, as I have before taken notice, is formed upon a vision of Ezekiel, who, as Grosius observes, has very much in him of Homer's spirit in the poetical parts of his prophecies.

The following lines in that glorious commissio which is given the Messiah to extirpate the host of rebel Angels, is drawn from a sublime passage in the psalms.

Go thou then Mightyest in thy Father's might Ascend my chariot, guide the rapid wheels
That shake Heaven's foundations, bring forth all my war,
My bow, my thunder, my almighty arms,
Gird on thy sword on thy puissant thigh.

The Reader will easily discover many other streaks of the same nature.

There is no question but Milton had heared his imagination with the fight of the Gods in Homer, before he entered upon this engagement of the Angels. Homer there gives us a scene of Men, Heroes, and Gods mixed together in battle. Mars animates the contending armies, and lifts up his voice in such a manner, that it is heard distinctly amid all the shouts and confusion of the fight. Jupiter at the same time thunders over their heads; while Neptune raises such a tempest, that the whole field of battle and all the tops of the mountains shake about them. The Poet tells us, that Pluto himself, whose habitation was in the very center of the earth, was so affrighted at the shock, that he leaped from his throne. Homer afterwards describes Vulcan as pouring down a storm of fire upon the river Xanthus, and Minerva as throwing a rock at Mars; who, he tells us, covered seven acres in his fall.

As Homer has introduced into his battle of the Gods every thing that is great and terrible in nature, Milton has filled his fight of good and bad Angels with all the like circumstances of horror. The shout of armies, and raging of brazen chariots, the hurling of rocks and mountains, the earthquake, the fire, the thunder, are all of them employed to lift up up the reader's Imagination, and give him a suitable idea of so great an action. With what art has the Poet represented the whole body of the earth trembling, even before it was created.

All Heaven refounded, and bad Earth been then,
All Earth, bad to its center stood.

In how sublime and just a manner does he afterwards describe the whole Heaven shaking under the wheels of the Messiah's chariot, with that exception of the throne of God?

Under his burning wheels
The fieds as Empyrean shook throughout;
All but the throne it self of God

Notwithstanding the Messiah appears cloathed with so much terror and majesty, the Poet has still found means to make his Readers conceive an idea of him beyond what he himself was able to describe.

Yet half his strength he put not forth, but cheeks
His thunder in mid volley, for he means
Not to destroy, but root them out of Heaven.

In a word, Milton's genius, which was so great in itself, and so strengthened by all the helps of learning, appears in this book every way equal to his subject, which was the most sublime that could enter into the thoughts of a Poet. As he knew all the arts of affecting the mind, he knew it was necessary to give it certain resting-places and opportunities of recovering it self from time to time; he has therefore with great address interpersed several speeches, reflections, similitudes, and the like reliefs, to diversifie his narration, and ease the attention of the Reader, that he might come fresh to his great action; and by such a contrast of ideas, have a more lively taste of the nobler parts of his description.
LONGINUS has observed, that there may be a loftiness in sentiments, where there is no passion, and brings instances out of ancient Authors to support this his opinion. The pathetic, as that great Critic observes, may animate and inflame the sublime, but is not essential to it. Accordingly, as he further remarks, we very often find that those who excel most in stirring up the passions, very often want the talent of writing in the great and sublime manner; and so on the contrary. Milton has shewn himself a Master in both these ways of writing. The seventh book, which we are now entering upon, is an instance of that sublime which is not mixt and worked up with passion. The Author appears in a kind of composed and sedate majesty; and though the sentiments do not give so great an emotion as those in the former book, they abound with as magnificent ideas. The sixth book, like a troubled ocean, represents greatness in confusion; the seventh affects the imagination like the ocean in a calm, and fills the mind of the Reader, without producing in it any thing like tumult or agitation.

The Critic above-mentioned, among the rules which he lays down for succeeding in the sublime way of writing, proposes to his Reader, that he should imitate the most celebrated Authors who have gone before him, and been engaged in works of the same nature; as in particular that if he writes on a poetical subject, he should consider how Homer would have spoken on such an occasion. By this means one great Genius often catches the flame from another, and writes in his spirit without copying servilely after him. There are a thousand shining passages in Virgil, which have been lighted up by Homer.
Milton, though his own natural strength of Genius was capable of furnishing out a perfect work, has doubtless very much raised and ennobled his conceptions, by such an imitation as that which Longinus has recommended.

In this book, which gives us an account of the six days' works, the Poet received but very few assistances from heathen writers, who were strangers to the wonders of Creation. But as there are many glorious Strokes of Poetry upon this subject in holy Writ, the Author has numbered allusions to them through the whole course of this book. The great Critic I have before mentioned, though an heathen, has taken notice of the sublime manner in which the Law-giver of the Jews has described the Creation in the first chapter of Genesis; and there are many other passages in Scripture, which rise up in the same majesty, where this subject is touched upon. Milton has shown his judgment very remarkably, in making use of such of these as were proper for his Poem, and in duly qualifying those high strains of eastern Poetry, which were suited to Readers whole imaginations were set to an higher pitch, than those of colder climates.

Adam's Speech to the Angel, wherein he desires an account of what had passed within the Regions of Nature before the Creation, is very great and solemn. The following lines, in which he tells him, that the day is not too far spent for him to enter upon such a subject, are exquisite in their kind.

And the great light of day yet wants to run
Much of his race though sleep, suspense in Heav'n
Held by thy voice, thy potent voice he hears,
And longer will delay to hear thee tell
His generation, &c.

The Angel's encouraging our first Parents in a modest pursuit after Knowledge, with the causes which he assigns for the Creation of the world, are very just and beautiful. The Messiah, by whom, as we are told in Scripture, the worlds were made, comes forth in the power of his Father, surronded with an Host of Angels, and cloathed with such a Majesty as becomes his entering upon a work, which, according to our conceptions, appears the utmost exertion of Omnipotence. What a beautiful description has our Author raiied upon that hint in one of the Prophets; And behold there came four Chariots out from between two Mountains, and the Mountains were Mountains of Brass.

About
About his chariots myriads were pour'd
Cherub and Seraph, potentates and thrones;
And virtues, winged spirits, and cherubs wing'd,
From the armoury of God, whose hand of old
Myriads between two brazen mountains lodg'd.
Against a solemn day, harness'd at hand;
Celestial equipage; and now came forth
Spontaneous, for within them spirit liv'd.
Attendant on their Lord: Heaven open'd wide
Her ever-daring gates; harmonious sound
On golden hinges moving ———

I have before taken notice of these chariots of God, and of these gates of Heaven, and shall here only add, that Homer gives us the same idea of the latter as opening of themselves, though he afterwards takes off from it, by telling us, that the Hours first of all removed those prodigious heaps of clouds which lay as a barrier before them.

I do not know any thing in the whole Poem more sublime than the description which follows, where the Messiah is represented at the head of his Angels, as looking down into the Chaos, calming its confusion, riding into the midst of it, and drawing the first outline of the Creation.

On heavenly ground they stood, and from the shore
They view'd the vast immensurable abyss
Outrageous as a sea, dark, wasteful, wild,
Up from the bottom turn'd by furious winds
And surging waves, as mountains to assault
Heav'n's height, and with the center mix the pole.
Silence ye troubled waves, and thou deep, peace;
Said then th' onopinc word, your discord end;
Nor said, but on the wings of Cherubim
Up-lifted, in paternal glory rode Far into Chaos, and the world unborn;
For Chaos heard his voice: him all his train
Follow'd, in bright procession to behold Creation, and the wonders of his might.
Then said the fervid wheel, and in his hand
He took the golden compass, prepared
In God's eternal sphere, to circumcribe

This
This universe, and all created things:
One foot he center'd, and the other turn'd
Round through the vast profundity obscure,
And said, Thus far extend, thus far thy bounds;
This be thy just circumference, o World.

The thought of the golden compasses is conceived altogether in Homer's spirit, and is a very noble incident in this wonderful description. Homer, when he speaks of the Gods, ascribes to them several arms and instruments with the fame greatness of imagination. Let the Reader only peruse the description of Minerva's Ægis, or Buckler, in the fifth book of the Iliad, with her spear which would overturn whole squadrons, and her helmet that was sufficient to cover an army drawn out of an hundred cities: the golden compasses in the above-mentioned passage appear a very natural instrument in the hand of him, whom Plato somewhere calls the Divine Geometrician. As Poetry delights in cloathing abstracted Ideas in allegories and sensible images, we find a magnificent description of the Creation formed after the same manner in one of the Prophets, wherein he describes the Almighty Architect as measuring the waters in the hollow of his hand, meeting out the heavens with his span, comprehending the dust of the earth in a measure, weighing the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance. Another of them describing the Supreme Being in this great work of Creation, represents him as laying the foundations of the earth, and stretching a line upon it. And in another place as garnishing the Heavens, stretching out the North over the empty place, and hanging the Earth upon nothing. This last noble thought Milton has expressed in the following verse.

And Earth self-balance'd on her center hung.

The beauties of description in this book lie so very thick, that it is impossible to enumerate them in this paper. The Poet has employed on them the whole energy of our tongue. The several great scenes of the Creation rise up to view one after another, in such a manner, that the reader seems present at this wonderful work, and to assist among the choirs of Angels, who are the spectators of it. How glorious is the conclusion of the first day.

Thus was the first day Ev'n and Morn.
Nor past uncelebrated, nor unsung
By the celestial choirs, when orient light Exhaling
Exhaling first from darkness they beheld,
Birth-day of Heaven and Earth; with joy and show
The holy universal orb they fill'd.

We have the same elevation of thought in the third day; when the mountains were brought forth, and the deep was made.

Immediately the mountains huge appear Emergent, and their broad bare backs upheave
Into the clouds, their tops ascend the sky:
So high as heaven's the humid hills, so low Down sink a hollow bottom broad and deep.
Capacious bed of waters

We have also the rising of the whole vegetable world described in this day's work, which is filled with all the Graces that other Poets have laboured on their description of the Spring, and leads the reader's imagination into a Theatre equally surprizing and beautiful.

The several glories of the Heavens make their appearance on the fourth day.

First in his East the glorious lamp was seen
Regent of day, and all the horizon round
Invested with bright rays, joyful to run
His longitude thro' Heaven's high rode: the gray
Dawn, and the Pleiades before him danced Shedding sweet influence: left bright the Moon,
But opposite in level'd West was set,
His mirror, with full face borrowing her light
From him, for other light she needed none
In that aspect, and still the distance keeps
'Til night: then in the East her turn she shews
Revolvi'd on Heaven's great axle, and her reign
With thousand lesser lights divisional holds,
With thousand thousand stars that then appear'd
Spangling the Hemisphere

One would wonder how the Poet could be so concise in his description of the Six days works, as to comprehend them within the bounds of an Epitome, and at the same time so particular, as to give us a lively idea of them. This is still more remarkable in his account of the fifth and sixth days, in which he has drawn out to our view the whole animal creation, creation, from the Reptil to the Behemoth. As the Lion and the Leviathan are two of the noblest productions in the world of living creatures, the Reader will find a most exquisite spirit of poetry in the account which our Author gives us of them. The sixth day concludes with the Formation of man, upon which the Angel takes occasion, as he did after the battle in heaven, to remind Adam of his obedience, which was the principal design of this his visit.

The Poet afterwards represents the Messiah returning into Heaven, and taking a survey of his great work. There is something inexpriably sublime in this part of the Poem, where the Author describes that great period of time, filled with so many glorious circumstances; when the heavens and earth were finished; when the Messiah ascended up in triumph through the everlasting gates; when he looked down with pleasure upon this new creation; when every part of nature seemed to rejoice in its existence; when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.

So ev'n and morn accomplished'd the sixth day:
Yet not till the Creator from his work
Defiling, the unweary'd, up return'd,
Up to the Heavn of Heavns his high abode,
Thence to behold this new created world
Th'addition of his Empire; how it shew'd
In prospect from his throne, how good, how fair, Answering his great idea. Up he rode Follow'd with acclamation and the sound
Symphonious of ten thousand harps that tun'd
Angelick harmonies: the earth, the air
Resounding, (thou remember'st, for thou heard'st)
The Heavens and all the Constellations rung,
The Planets in their station lighting fluid,
While the bright pomp ascended jubilant.
Open ye everlasting gates, they sing,
Open ye Heavns, your living doors, let in
The great Creator from his work return'd Magnificent, his six days work, a world.

I cannot conclude this book upon the Creation, without mentioning a Poem which has lately appeared under that title. The work was undertaken with so good an intention, and is executed with so great a majesty,

THES accounts which Raphael gives of the battle of Angels, and the Creation of the world, have in them those qualifications which the Critics judge requisite to an Episde. They are nearly related to the principal Action, and have a just connection with the Fable.

The eighth book opens with a beautiful description of the impression which this discourse of the Arch-angel made on our first Parents. Adam afterwards, by a very natural Curiosity, enquires concerning the motions of those Celestial bodies which make the most glorious appearance among the six days works. The Poet here, with a great deal of art, represents Eve as withdrawing from this part of their conversation to amusements more suitable to her sex. He well knew, that the Episde in this book, which is filled with Adam's account of his passion and esteem for Eve, would have been improper for her hearing; and he therefore devised very just and beautiful reasons for her retiring.
So spake our Sire, and by his countenance seem'd Euring on studious thoughts abstruse; which Eve,
Percieving where she sat retired in sight,
With lowliness majestic from her seat,
And grace that soon who saw to wish her joy,
Rose, and went forth among her fruits and flowers,
To view how they prosper'd, bad and bloom,
Her nursery: they at her coming sprung,
And touch'd by her fair tendance gladlier grew.
Yet went she not, as not with such discourse Delighted, or not capable her ear
Of what was high: such pleasure she refer'd;
Adam relating, she sole auditors;
Her husband the relater she prefer'd
Before the Angel, and of him to ask Chefs rather: he, she knew, would intermix
Grateful digressions, and subie high dispute
With conjugal careness, from his lip
Not words alone pleas'd her, O when meet now
Such parts in love, and mutual honour join'd!

The Angel's returning a doubtful answer to Adam's enquiries, was not only proper for the moral reason which the Poet assigns, but because it would have been highly absurd to have given the function of an Arch-angel to any particular system of philosophy. The chief points in the Ptolemaic and Copernican hypothesis are described with great conciseness and perspicuity, and at the same time skilfully in very pleasing and poetical images.

Adam, to detain the Angel, enters afterwards upon his own history, and relates to him the circumstances in which he found himself upon his creation; as also his conversation with his Maker, and his first meeting with Eve. There is no part of the Poem more apt to raise the attention of the reader, than this discourse of our great ancestor; as nothing can be more surprising and delightful to us, than to hear the sentiments that arose in the first man while he was yet new and fresh from the hands of his Creator. The Poet has interwoven every thing which is delivered upon this subject in holy writ with so many beautiful impressions of his own, that nothing can be conceived more just and natural than this whole Episode. As our Author knew this subject could not but be agreeable able to his Reader, he would not throw it into the relation of the six days works, but reserved it for a distinct Episod, that he might have an opportunity of expatiating upon it more at large. Before I enter on this part of the Poem, I cannot but take notice of two shining passages in the dialogue between Adam and the Angel. The first is that wherein our Ancestor gives an account of the pleasure he took in conversing with him, which contains a very noble moral.

For while I sit with thee, I dwell in heav'n,
   And sweeter thy discourse is to my ear
Than fruits of palm-tree pleasantest to thirst,
   And bower, both from labour, at the hour.
Of sweet repast; they satiate, and soon fill,
   The pleasant; but thy words with grace divine
Imbu'd, bring to their sweetness no satiety.

The other I shall mention is that in which the Angel gives a reason why he should be glad to hear the story Adam was about to relate.

For I that day was absent, as befell,
   Bound on a voyage uncouth and obscure,
Far on excursion towards the gates of hell,
   Squar'd in full legio'n (such command we had)
To see that none thence issued forth a spy,
   Or enemy, while God was in his work,
Left he, incens'd at such eruption bold,
   Destruction with creation might have mix'd.

There is no question but our Poet drew the image in what follows from that in Virgil's sixth book, where Aeneas and the Sibyl land before the Adamantine Gates, which are there described as shut upon the place of torments, and listen to the groans, the clank of chains, and the noise of iron whips, that were heard in those regions of ruin and for-row.

——Fast we found, fast still
The dismal Gates, and barricado'd strong;
But long e'er our approaching heard within Noise, other than the sound of dance or song,
Torment, and loud lament, and furious rage.

Adam
Adam then proceeds to give an account of his condition and sentiments immediately after his Creation. How agreeably does he represent the posture in which he found himself, the delightful landscape that surrounded him, and the gladness of heart which grew up in him on that occasion.

—as new waked from soundest sleep,
Soft on the flowry herb I found me laid
In balmy swain, which with his beams the Sun
Soon dried, and the reeking moisture fed.
Straight toward heav'n my wondering eyes I turned,
And gazed awhile the ample sky, till rais'd
By quick instinctive motion up I sprang,
As thitherward endeavouring, and upright
Stood on my feet: about me round I saw
Hill, dale, and shady woods, and sunny plains,
And liquid laps of murmuring streams; by these,
Creatures that liv'd, and mov'd, and walk'd, or flew,
Birds on the branches warbling; all things smil'd:
With fragrance and with joy my heart o'erflow'd.

Adam is afterwards described as surprised at his own Existence, and taking a Survey of himself, and of all the works of Nature. He likewise is represented as discovering by the light of Reason, that he and every thing about him must have been the effect of some Being infinitely good and powerful, and that this Being had a right to his worship and adoration. His first address to the Sun, and to those parts of the Creation which made the most distinguished figure, is very natural and amusing to the imagination.

—Thou Sun, said I, fair light,
And thou enlightened earth, so fresh and gay,
To hills and dales, ye rivers, woods, and plains,
And ye that live and move, fair creatures tell,
Tell if you saw, how came I thus, how here?

His next Sentiment, when upon his first going to sleep, he fancies himself losing his Existence, and falling away into nothing, can never be sufficiently admired. His Dream, in which he still preserves the consciousness of his Existence, together with his removal into the Garden which was prepared for his reception, are also circumstances finely imaged, and grounded upon what is delivered in sacred story. These
These and the like wonderful incidents in this part of the work, have in them all the Beauties of Novelty, at the same time that they have all the Graces of Nature. They are such as none but a great Genius could have thought of, though, upon the perusal of them, they seem to rise of themselves from the subject of which he treats. In a word, though they are Natural they are not Obvious, which is the true character of all fine writing.

The impression which the interdiction of the Tree of Life left in the mind of our first Parent, is described with great strength and judgment; as the image of the several beasts and birds pass'd in review before him is very beautiful and lively.

—Each bird and beast behold Approaching two and two, these courting low
With blandishment; each bird swoop'd on his wing:
I nam'd them as they pass'd—

Adam, in the next place, describes a conference which he held with his Maker upon the subject of Solitude. The Poet here represents the supreme Being, as making an Effay of his own work, and putting to the trial that Reasoning faculty with which he had endued his Creature. Adam urges, in this divine Colloquy, the impossibility of his being happy, though he was the Inhabitant of Paradise, and Lord of the whole Creation, without the conversation and society of some rational creature, who should partake those blessings with him. This Dialogue, which is supported chiefly by the beauty of the thoughts, without other poetical ornaments, is as fine a part as any in the whole Poem: the more the Reader examines the justness and delicacy of its Sentiments, the more he will find himself pleased with it. The Poet has wonderfully preserved the character of Majesty and Condescension in the Creator, and at the same time that of Humility and Adoration in the Creature, as particularly in the following lines,

Thus I presumptuous; and the vision bright,
As with a smile more brighten'd, thus reply'd, &c.
— I wish leave of speech implo'red
And humble deprecation thus reply'd.
Let not my words offend thee, heavenly power,
My Maker, be propitious while I speak, &c.

Adam
Adam then proceeds to give an account of his second sleep, and of the Dream in which he beheld the formation of Eve. The new passion that was awakened in him at the sight of her is touched very finely.

Under his former bands a Creature grew,
Manlike, but different sex; so lovely fair;
That what seem'd fair in all the world, seem'd now
Mean, or in her finis'd up, in her contain'd;
And in her Looks, which from that time inflam'd
Sweetness into my heart, unfeet before;
And into all things from her air inspir'd
The spirit of love and amorous delight.

Adam's distress upon losing sight of this beautiful Phantom, with his exclamations of joy and gratitude at the discovery of a real Creature, who resembled the apparition which had been presented to him in his dream; the approaches he makes to her, and his manner of courtship, are all laid together in a most exquisite propriety of Sentiments.

Though this part of the Poem is worked up with great warmth and spirit, the love which is described in it is every way suitable to a state of innocence. If the Reader compares the description which Adam here gives of his leading Eve to the nuptial bower, with that which Mr.
Dryden has made on the same occasion in a Scene of his Fall of Man, he will be sensible of the great care which Milton took to avoid all thoughts on so delicate a subject, that might be offensive to religion or good man-ers. The Sentiments are warm, but not cold, and convey to the mind ideas of the most transporting passion, and of the greatest purity. What a noble mixture of rapture and innocence has the Author joined together, in the reflection which Adam makes on the pleasures of love, compared to th'ole of sense.

Thus have I told thee all my state, and brought
My story to the sum of earthly Bliss;
Which I enjoy, and must confess to find
In all things else delight indeed, but such
As we'd or not, works in the mind no change;
Nor vehement desire, these delights
I mean of taste, sight, smell, herbs, fruits and flowers,
Walks, and the melody of birds; but here
Far otherwise, transported I behold.

Trans-
Transported touch, here passion first I felt,
Commotion strange; in all enjoyments else
Superior and unmoved, here only weak
Against the charm of Beauty's powerful glance.
Or Nature fail'd in me, and left some part
Not proof enough such object to sustain,
Or from my side subduing, took perhaps
More than enough; at least on her below'd
Too much of ornament, in outward show Elaborate, of inward less exact.
—When I approach
Her loveliness, so absolute she seems
And in herself compleat, so well to know
Her own, that what she wills to do or say
Seems wisest, virtuousest, sincerest, best;
All higher knowledge in her presence falls
Degraded: Wisdom in discourse with her
Loses disconvenience, and like folly shews;
Authority and Reason on her wait,
As one intended first, not after made Occasionally; and to consummate all,
Greatness of mind, and nobleness their seat
Build in her loveliness, and create an awe
About her, as a guard angelic plac'd.

These Sentiments of love, in our first Parent, gave the Angel such an insight into humane nature, that he seems apprehensive of the evils which might befall the species in general, as well as Adam in particular, from the excess of this passion. He therefore fortifies him against it by timely admonitions; which very artfully prepare the mind of the Reader for the occurrences of the next book, where the weakness, of which Adam here gives such distant discoveries, brings about that fatal event which is the subject of the Poem. His discourse, which follows the gentle rebuque he received from the Angel, shews that his love, however violent it might appear, was still founded in Reason, and consequently not improper for Paradise.

Neither her outside form so fair, nor ough't
In recreation common to all kinds (Though higher of the generic bed by far,

And
And with mysterious reverence I deem
So much delights me as those graceful acts,
Those thousand decencies that daily flow
From all her words and actions mixed with love
And sweet compliance, which declare unfeign'd
Union of mind, or in us both one soul
Harmony to behold in wedded pair.

Adam's speech, at parting with the Angel, has in it a deference and gratitude agreeable to an inferior nature, and at the same time a certain dignity and greatnesse suitable to the Father of mankind in his state of Innocence.

If we look into the three great heroic Poems which have appeared in the world, we may observe that they are built upon very light foundations. Homer lived near 300 years after the Trojan war, and, as the writing of history was not then in use among the Greeks, we may very well suppose, that the tradition of Achilles and Ulysses had brought down but very few particulars to his knowledge, though there is no question but he has wrought into his two Poems such of their remarkable adventures as were still talked of among his contemporaries.

The story of Aeneas, on which Virgil founded his Poem, was likewise very bare of circumstances, and by that means afforded him an opportunity of embellishing it with fiction, and giving a full range to his own invention. We find, however, that he has interwoven, in the course of his Fable, the principal particulars, which were generally believed among the Romans, of Aeneas his voyage and settlement in Italy.

The Reader may find an abridgment of the whole story as collected out of the antient Historians, and as it was received among the Romans, in Dionysius Halicarnassensis.
Since none of the Critics have considered Virgil’s Fable, with relation to this history of Æneas; it may not, perhaps, be amiss to examine it in this light, so far as it regards my present purpose. Whoever looks into the abridgment above-mentioned, will find that the character of Æneas is filled with piety to the Gods, and a superstitious observation of prodigies, oracles, and predictions. Virgil has not only preserved this character in the person of Æneas, but has given a place in his Poem to those particular prophecies which he found recorded of him in history and tradition. The Poet took the matters of fact as they came down to him, and circumstanced them after his own manner, to make them appear the more natural, agreeable, or surprizing. I believe very many readers have been shocked at that ludicrous Prophecy, which one of the Harpies pronounced to the Trojans in the third book, namely, that before they had built their intended city, they should be reduced by hunger to eat their very Tables. But, when they hear this was one of the circumstances that had been transmitted to the Romans in the history of Æneas, they will think the Poet did very well in taking notice of it. The historian above-mentioned acquaints us, a Prophetess had foretold Æneas, that he should take his voyage westward, till his companions should eat their Tables; and that accordingly, upon his landing in Italy, as they were eating their flesh upon cakes of bread, for want of other conveniencies, they afterwards fed on the cakes themselves; upon which one of the company said merrily, We are eating our Tables. They immediately took the hint, says the Historian, and concluded the prophecy to be fulfilled. As Virgil did not think it proper to omit so material a particular in the history of Æneas, it may be worth while to consider with how much judgment he has qualified it, and taken off every thing that might have appeared improper for a passage in an Heroic Poem. The Prophetess who foretells it is an hungry Harpy, as the Person who discovers it is young Æneas.

Hinc etiam meus consuimus, inquit Iulus.

Such an observation, which is beautiful in the mouth of a boy, would have been ridiculous from any other in the company. I am apt to think that the changing of the Trojan Fleet into Water-Nymphs, which is the most violent Machine in the whole Æneid, and has given offence to several Critics, may be accounted for the same way. Virgil himself, before he begins that relation, premises that what he was going to tell, appeared incredible, but that it was justified by tradition. What further confirms me that this change of the Fleet was a celebrated circumstance in the history of Aeneas is, that Ovid has given a place to the fame Metamorphosis in his account of the heathen Mythology.

None of the Critics I have met with having considered the Fable of the Aeneid in this light, and taken notice how the tradition, on which it was founded, authorizes those parts in it which appear the most exceptionable, I hope the length of this reflection will not make it unacceptable to the curious part of my Readers.

The history, which was the basis of Milton's Poem, is still shorter than either that of the Iliad or Aeneid. The Poet has likewise taken care to infect every circumstance of it in the body of his Fable. The ninth book, which we are here to consider, is raised upon that brief account in Scripture, wherein we are told that the Serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field, that he tempted the Woman to eat of the for-bidden fruit, that she was overcome by this temptation, and that Adam followed her example. From these few particulars Milton has formed one of the most entertaining Fables that Invention ever produced. He has dispersed of these several circumstances among to many agreeable and natural fictions of his own, that his whole story looks only like a Comment upon sacred writ, or rather seems to be a full and compleat relation of what the other is only an Epitome. I have insisted the longer on this consideration, as I look upon the disposition and contrivance of the Fables to be the principal beauty of the ninth book, which has more Story in it, and is fuller of incidents, than any other in the whole Poem. Satan's traversing the globe, and still keeping within the shadow of the night, as fearing to be discovered by the Angel of the Sun, who had before detected him, is one of those beautiful imaginations with which he introduces this his second series of adventures. Having examined the nature of every creature, and found out one which was the most proper for his purpose, he again returns to Paradise; and, to avoid discovery, flies by night with a river that ran under the Garden, and rises up again through a fountain that issued from it by the Tree of Life. The Poet, who, as we have before taken notice, speaks as little as possible in his own person, and, after the example of Homer, fills every part of his work with manners and characters, introduces a Soliloquy of this infernal agent, who was thus relieved in the destruction of man. He is then described as gliding through the Garden under the resemblance of a mist, in order to find out that creature in which he designed to tempt our first Parents. This description has something in it very poetical and surprizing.
So saying, through each thicket dank or dry
Like a black mist, low creeping, he held on His midnight search, where sooneft he might find
The Serpent : him saft sleeping soon he found
In labyrinth of many a round, self-roll'd,
His head the midst, well fard'd with subtle wiles.

The Author afterwards gives us a description of the Morning, which is wonderfully suitable to a divine Poem, and peculiar to that first season of nature; he represents the earth before it was curst as a great Altar breathing out its Incense from all parts, and sending up a pious fav'r our to the nostrils of its Creator; to which he adds a noble idea of Adam and Eve, as offering their morning worship, and filling up the universal confort of praise and adoration.

Now when as sacred light began to dawn
In Eden on the humid flowers, that breathed
Their morning incense, when all things that breathe
From the Earth's great Altar send up silent praise.
To the Creator, and his nostrils fill
With grateful smell; forth came the human pair,
And join their vocal worship to the choir
Of creatures wanting voice.

The dispute which follows between our two first Parents is represented with great art: it proceeds from a difference of judgment, not of passion, and is managed with reason, not with heat: it is such a dispute as we may suppose might have happened in Paradise, had man continued happy and innocent. There is great delicacy in the moralities which are interpersed in Adam's discourse, and which the most ordinary Reader cannot but take notice of. The force of love which the Father of mankind so finely describes in the eight book, and which is inferred in the foregoing paper, shews itself here in many fine instances: as in those fond regards he cast towards Eve at her parting from him.

Her long with ardent look his eye pursu'd
Delighted, but desiring more her stay.
Oft he to her his charge of quick return
Repeated; she to him as oft engaged
To be return'd by noon amid the bowse.

In his impatience and amusement during her absence.

--- Adam
Adam the while Waiting desirous her return, had we've
Of choicest flowers a garland to adorn
Her tresses and her rural labours crown,
As reapers oft are wont their harvests Queen.
Great joy he promised to his thoughts, and now
Solace in her return, so long delayed.

But particularly in that passionate speech, where seeing her irrecoverably lost, he resolves to perish with her rather than to live without her.

Some cursed fraud
Or enemy hath beguiled thee, yet unknown,
And we with thee hath ruin'd, for with thee
Certain my resolution is to die;
How can I live without thee, how forgo
Thy sweet converse, and love so dearly join'd,
To live again in these wild woods forlorn?
Should God create another Eve, and I Another rib afford, yet lost of thee
Would never from my heart; no, no, I feel
The link of nature draw me: flesh of flesh,
Bone of my bone thou art, and from thy bone
Mine never shall be parted, bliss or woe.

The beginning of this speech, and the preparation to it, are animated with the same spirit as the conclusion, which I have here quoted.

The several wiles which are put in practice by the tempter, when he found Eve separated from her husband, the many pleasing images of Nature which are intermixed in this part of the story, with its gradual and regular progress to the fatal Catastrophe, are so very remarkable, that it would be superfluous to point out their respective beauties.

I have avoided mentioning any particular Similitudes in my remarks on this great work, because I have given a general account of them in my paper on the first book. There is one, however, in this part of the Poem which I shall here quote, as it is not only very beautiful, but the closest of any in the whole Poem; I mean that where the Serpent is described as rolling forward in all his pride, animated by the evil spirit, and conducting Eve to her destruction, while Adam was at too great a distance from her to give her his assistance. These several particulars are all of them wrought into the following Similitude.

Hope
Hope elevates, and joy
Brightens his crest, as when a wandering fowl
Compells of unius tantum vapour, which the night
Condenses, and the cold invirons rounds
Kindled through agitation to a flame.
(Which oft, they say, some evil Spirit attains)
Hovering and blazing with delusive light,
Misleads th' amaz'd night-wanderer from his way;
To bogs and mires, and oft, thro' pond or pool,
There sail'd up and loft, from succour far.

That secret intoxication of pleasure, with all those transient flushings of guilt and joy which the Poet represents in our first parents, upon their eating the forbidden fruit, to those flaggings of spirit, damps of sorrow, and mutual accusations which succeed it, are conceived with a wonderful imagination, and described in very natural Sentiments.

When Dido in the fourth Aeneid yielded to that fatal temptation which ruined her, Virgil tells us the Earth trembled, the Heavens were filled with flashes of lightning, and the Nymphs howled upon the mountain tops. Milton, in the same poetical Spirit, has described all Nature as disturbed upon Eve's eating the forbidden fruit.

So saying, her rash hand in evil hour
Forth reaching to the fruit, she plucks, she eat:
Earth felt the wound, and Nature from her seat
Sighing thro' all her works gave signs of woe
That all was lost—

Upon Adam's falling into the same guilt, the whole Creation appears a second time in convulsions.

He scrupled not to eat
Against his better knowledge, not deceived,
But firmly overcome with female charm.
Earth trembled from her entrails, as again
In pangs, and Nature gave a second groan,
Skies lowered, and, muttering thunder, some sad drops
Kept at compatiating of the mortal sin.

As all Nature suffered by the guilt of our first parents, these symptoms of trouble and confutation are wonderfully imagined, not only as Prodigies, but as marks of her sympathizing in the Fall of man.

Adam's
Adam's converse with Eve, after having eaten the forbidden fruit, is an exact copy of that between Jupiter and Juno in the fourteenth Iliad. Juno there approaches Jupiter with the girdle which she had received from Venus; upon which he tells her, that she appeared more charming and desirable than she had ever done before, even when their loves were at the highest. The Poet afterwards describes them as reposing on a summit of mount Ida, which produced under them a bed of flowers, the Lotus, the Crocus, and the Hyacinth, and concludes his description with their falling asleep.

Let the Reader compare this with the following passage in Milton, which begins with Adam's speech to Eve.

For never did thy beauty since the day
I first beheld thee from the veil concealed,
With all perfections, so inflame my sense,
With ardor to enjoy thee, fairer now
Than ever, beauty of this virtuous tree.
So far she, and forbore not glance or toy
Of amorous intent, well understood
Of Eve, whose eye darts contagious fire,
Her hand is seised, and to a shady bank
Thick over-head with verdant roof embower'd
He led her nothing loath; flowers were the couch,
Pansies, and Violet, and Alphodel,
And Hyacinth, earth's softest softest lap
There they their fill of love, and love's delight
Look large, of their mutual guilt the seal,
The solace of their sin, till down sleep
Opprest them.

As no Poet seems ever to have studied Homer more, or that he resembled him in the greatness of genius than Milton, I think I should have given but a very imperfect account of his beauties, if I had not observed the most remarkable passages which look like parallels in these two great Authors. I might, in the course of these criticisms, have taken notice of many particular lines and expressions which are translated from the Greek Poets; but as I thought this would have appeared too minute and over-curious, I have purposely omitted them. The greater incidents, however, are not only set off by being shewn in the same light with several of the same nature in Homer, but by that means may be also guarded against the cavils of the tale-tellers or ignorant.
THE tenth book of Paradise Lost has a greater variety of persons in it than any other in the whole Poem. The Author upon the winding up of his action introduces all those who had any concern in it, and shews with great beauty the influence which it had upon each of them. It is like the last Act of a well written Tragedy, in which all who had a part in it are generally drawn up before the Audience, and represented under those circumstances in which the determination of the action places them.

I shall therefore consider this book under four heads, in relation to the celestial, the infernal, the human, and the imaginary persons, who have their respective parts allotted in it.

To begin with the celestial persons: The guardian Angels of Paradise are described as returning to Heaven upon the fall of man, in order to approve their vigilance; their arrival, their manner of reception, with the sorrow which appeared in themselves, and in those spirits who are said to rejoice at the conversion of a sinner, are very finely laid together in the following lines.

Up into Heaven from Paradise in haste
Th' angelic guards ascented, mure and sad
For man, for of his state by this they knew,
Much wondering how the subtle fiend had fallen
Entrance unseen. Soon as th' unwelcome news
From earth arriv'd at Heaven gate, displeas'd
All were who heard, dim sadness did not spare
That time celestial visages, yet mixt
With pity, violated not their bliss.
About the new-arriv'd, in multitudes

Th' E.
Th' Ethereal people ran, to hear and know How all befell: they towards the throne supreme Accountable made bafle to make appear
With righteous plea, their utmost vigilance,
And easily approved: when the most high Eternal Father from his secret cloud
Amidst in thunder uttered thus his voice.

The same divine person, who in the foregoing parts of this Poem interceded for our first parents before their fall, overthrew the rebel Angels, and created the world, is now represented as descending to Paradise, and pronouncing sentence upon the three offenders. The cool of the evening being a circumstance with which holy Writ introduces this great scene, it is poetically described by our Author, who has also kept religiously to the form of words, in which the three several sentences were puffed upon Adam, Eve, and the Serpent. He has rather chosen to neglect the numerousness of his verfe, than to deviate from those speeches which are recorded on this great occasion. The guilt and confusion of our first parents standing naked before their Judge, is touched with great beauty. Upon the arrival of Sin and Death into the works of the Creation, the Almighty is again introduced as speaking to his Angels that surrounded him.

See with what heat these dogs of hell advance
To waste and havoc yonder world, which I
So fair and good created, &c.

The following passage is formed upon that glorious image of holy Writ, which compares the voice of an innumerable host of Angels, uttering Hallelujah, to the voice of mighty thunderings, or of many waters.

He ended, and the heavenly audience loud
Sang Hallelujah, as the sound of seas,
Through multitudes that sung: "Just are thy ways,
Righteous are thy decrees in all thy works,
Who can extenuate thee—"

Though the Author in the whole course of his Poem, and particularly in the book we are now examining, has infinite allusions to places of scripture, I have only taken notice in my Remarks of such as are of a poetical nature, and which are woven with great beauty into the body of this fable.
Fable. Of this kind is that passage in the present book, where describing Sin and Death as marching through the works of nature, he adds,

———Behind her Death
Close following pace for pace, not mounted yet
On his pale horse!

Which alludes to that passage in Scripture so wonderfully poetical, and terrifying to the imagination. And I looked, and beheld a pale horse, and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him: and power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with sickness, and with beasts of the earth.

Under this first head of celestial persons we must likewise take notice of the command which the Angels received, to produce the several changes in nature, and fully the beauty of the creation. Accordingly they are represented as infecting the Stars and Planets with malignant influences, weakening the light of the Sun, bringing down the winter into the milder regions of nature, planting winds and storms in several quarters of the sky, flooding the clouds with thunder, and in short, perverting the whole frame of the universe to the condition of its criminal inhabitants. As this is a noble incident in the Poem, the following lines, in which we see the Angels heaving up the earth, and placing it in a different posture to the Sun from what it had before the fall of man, is conceived with that sublime imagination which was so peculiar to this great author.

Some say he bid his Angels turn asance
The poles of earth twice ten degrees and more
From the Sun's axle; they with labour push'd Oblique the centric globe.

We are in the second place to consider the infernal agents under the view which Milton has given us of them in this book. It is observed by those who would set forth the greatness of Virgil's plan, that he conduces his reader through all the parts of the earth which were discovered in his time. Asia, Africa, and Europe are the several scenes of his Fable. The plan of Milton's Poem is of an infinitely greater extent, and fills the mind with many more astonishing circumstances. Satan having surrounded the earth seven times, departs at length from Paradise. We then see him steering his course among the constellations, and after having traversed the whole creation, pursing his voyage through the Chaos, and entering into his own infernal dominions,
His first appearance in the assembly of fallen Angels, is worked up with circumstances which give a delightful surprize to the reader; but there is no incident in the whole Poem which does this more than the transformation of the whole audience, that follows the account their leader gives them of his expedition. The gradual change of Satan himself is described after Ovid's manner, and may vie with any of those celebrated transformations which are looked upon as the most beautiful parts in that Poet's works. Milton never fails of improving his own hints, and bestowing the last finishing touches to every incident which is admitted into his Poem. The unexpected hcofs which rises in this episode, the dimensions and bulk of Satan so much superior to those of the infernal spirits who lay under the same transformation, with the annual change which they are supposed to suffer, are instances of this kind. The beauty of the diction is very remarkable in this whole episode, as I have observed in the fifth paper of these remarks the great judgment with which it was contrived.

The parts of Adam and Eve, or the human persons, come next under our consideration. Milton's art is nowhere more shown than in his conducting the parts of these our first parents. The representation he gives of them, without falsifying the story, is wonderfully contrived to influence the reader with pity and compassion towards them. Though Adam involves the whole species in misery, his crime proceeds from a weakness which every man is inclined to pardon and commiserate, as it seems rather the frailty of human nature, than of the person who offended. Every one is apt to excuse a fault which he himself might have fallen into. It was the excess of love for Eve that ruined Adam and his posterity. I need not add, that the author is justified in this particular by many of the fathers, and the most orthodox writers. Milton has by this means filled a great part of his Poem with that kind of writing which the French Critics call the Tendre, and which is in a particular manner engaging to all sorts of readers.

Adam and Eve, in the book we are now considering, are likewise drawn with such sentiments as do not only interest the reader in their afflictions, but raise in him the most melting passions of humanity and commiseration. When Adam sees the several changes in nature produced about him, he appears in a disorder of mind suitable to one who had forfeited both his innocence and happiness: he is filled with horror, remorse, despair; in the anguish of his heart he expostulates with his Creator for having given him an unasked existence.
Did I request thee, Maker, from my clay
To mould me man, did I solicit thee
From darkness to promote me, or here place
In this delicious garden? As my will Concur'd not to my being, 'twere but right
And equal to reduce me to my dust,
Desirous to resign, and render back
All I receiv'd—

He immediately after recovers from his presumption, owns his doom to be just, and begs that the death which is threatened may be inflicted on him.

Why delays
His hand to execute what his decree
Fix'd on this day? why do I overlive,
Why am I mock'd with death, and lengthen'd out
To deathless pain? how gladly would I meet Mortality my sentence, and be earth
Infensible! how glad would lay me down
As in my mother's lap? there should I rest
And sleep secure; his dreadful voice no more
Would thunder in my ears, no fear of woe
To me and to my Off-spring, would torment me
With cruel expectation—

This whole speech is full of the like emotion, and varied with all those sentiments which we may suppose natural to a mind so broken and distrub'd. I must not omit that generous concern which our first father shews in it for his posterity, and which is to proper to affect the reader.

Hide me from the face
Of God, whom to behold was then my delight
Of happiness: yet well if here would end
The misery, I defer'd it, and would bear
My own defervings; but this will not serve;
All that I eat, or drink, or shall beget,
Is propagated curse. O voice once heard Delightfully, encreas'd and multiply,
Now death to hear—

In me all.
Posterity stands curs'd, fair patrimony
That I must leave you, sons! O were I able To waste it all myself, and leave you none!
So disinherited how would you bless
Me now your curs'd! ah, why should all mankind
For one man's fault thus guiltless be condemned,
If guiltless? but from me what can proceed
But all corrupt.

Who, can afterwards behold the father of mankind extended upon the earth, uttering his midnight complaints, bewailing his existence, and willing for death, without sympathizing with him in his distress?

Thus Adam to himself lamented loud
Through the still night, not now, as 'er man fell Wholesome and cool and mild, but with black air
Accompanied, with dumps and dreadful gloom;
Which to his evil conscience represented
All things with double terror: on the ground
Outstretched he lay, on the cold ground, and oft Curs'd his creation, death as oft accus'd
Of tardy execution.

The part of Eve in this book is no less passionate, and apt to sway the reader in her favour. She is represented with great tenderness as approaching Adam, but is spurned from him, with a spirit of upbraiding and indignation conformable to the nature of man, whose passions had now gained the dominion over him. The following passage wherein she is described as renewing her address to him, with the whole speech that follows it, have something in them exquisitely moving and pathetic.

He added not, and from her turn'd; but Eve
Not so repuls'd, with tears that cease'd not flowing,
And tresses all dishe'rd, at his feet
Fell humble, and embracing them besought
His peace, and thus proceeded in her plaint.
For sake me not thus, Adam; witness Heaven
What love sincere and reverence in my heart
I bear thee, and unuttering have offended,
Unhappily deceiv'd; thy suppliant
I beg, and cease thy knives; beseach me not.

Whereon
Whereon I live, thy gentle looks, thy aid,
Thy counsel in this uttermost distress,
My only strength and stay: for born of thee
Whether shall I betake me, where subject?
While yet we live, scarce one short hour perhaps,
Between us two let there be peace, &c.

Adam's reconciliation to her is worked up in the same spirit of tenderness. Eve afterwards proposes to her husband, in the blindness of her despair, to prevent their guilt from descending upon posterity; they should resolve to live childless; or, if that could not be done, they should seek their own deaths by violent methods. As those sentiments naturally engage the reader to regard the mother of mankind with more than ordinary commiseration, they likewise contain a very fine moral. The resolution of dying, to end our miseries, does not shew such a degree of magnanimity as a resolution to bear them, and submit to the dispensations of Providence. Our author has therefore, with great delicacy, represented Eve as entertaining this thought, and Adam as disapproving it.

We are, in the last place, to consider the imaginary persons, or Death and Sin, who act a large part in this book. Such beautiful extended Allegories are certainly some of the finest compositions of Genius; but, as I have before observed, are not agreeable to the nature of an Heroic Poem. This of Sin and Death is very exquisite in its kind, if not considered as a part of such a work. The truths contained in it are too clear and open, that I shall not lose time in explaining them; but shall only observe, that a Reader who knows the strength of the English tongue, will be amazed to think how the Poet could find such apt words and phrases to describe the actions of those two imaginary persons, and particularly in that part where Death is exhibited as forming a bridge over the Chaos; a work suitable to the Genius of Milton.

Since the subject I am upon gives me an opportunity of speaking more at large of such shadowy and imaginary persons as may be introduced into Heroic Poems, I shall beg leave to explain my self in a manner which is curious in its kind, and which none of the Critics have treated of. It is certain Homer and Virgil are full of imaginary persons, who are very beautiful in Poetry when they are just shewn without being engaged in any furies of action. Homer indeed represents Sleep as a person, and describes a short part to him in his Iliad; but we must consider that though though we now regard such a person as entirely shadowy and unsubstantial, the heathens made statues of him, placed him in their temples, and looked upon him as a real Deity. When Homer makes use of other such allegorical persons, it is only in short expressions, which convey an ordinary thought to the mind in the most pleasing manner, and may rather be looked upon as poetical phrases than allegorical descriptions. Instead of telling us that men naturally fly when they are terrified, he introduces the persons of Flight and Fear, who, he tells us, are inseparable companions. Instead of saying that the time was come when Apollo ought to have received his recompence, he tells us that the Hours brought him his reward. Instead of describing the effects which Minerva's Aegis produced in battle, he tells us that the brims of it were encompassed by Terror, Rout, Discord, Fury, Pursuit, Massacre, and Death. In the same figure of speaking, he represents Victory as following Diomedes, Discord as the mother of funerals and mourning; Venus as dressed by the Graces; Bellona as wearing Terror and Conflagration like a Garment. I might give several other instances out of Homer, as well as a great many out of Virgil. Milton has likewise very often made use of the same way of speaking, as where he tells us, that Victory sat on the right hand of the Messiah when he marched forth against the rebel Angels; that at the rising of the Sun the Hours unbarr'd the gates of Light; that Discord was the daughter of Sin. Of the same nature are those expressions, where describing the singing of the Nightingale, he adds, Silence was pleased; and upon the Messiah's bidding peace to the Chaos, Confusion heard his voice. I might add innumerable instances of our Poet's writing in this beautiful figure. It is plain that these I have mentioned, in which persons of an imaginary nature are introduced, are such short Allegories as are not designed to be taken in the literal sense, but only to convey particular circumstances to the Reader after an usual and entertaining manner. But when such persons are introduced as principal Actors, and engaged in a series of adventures, they take too much upon them, and are by no means proper for an Heroic Poem, which ought to appear credible in its principal parts. I cannot forbear therefore thinking that Sin and Death are as improper Agents in a work of this nature, as Strength and Necessity in one of the Tragedies of Aeschylus, who represented those two persons nailing down Prometheus to a Rock, for which he has been justly cenured by the greatest Critics. I do not know any imaginary person made use of in a more sublime manner of thinking than that in one of the Prophets, who describing God as de-Ascending from heaven, and visiting the sins of mankind, adds that dreadful circumstance: Before him went the Pestilence. It is certain this imaginary person might have been described in all her purple spots. The Fever might have marched before her, Pain might have stood on her right hand, Phrenzy on her left, and Death in her rear. She might have been introduced as gliding down from the tail of a Comet, or darted upon the earth in a flash of lightning: she might have tainted the Atmosphere with her breath; the very glaring of her eyes might have scattered Infection. But I believe every Reader will think, that in such sublime writings the mentioning of her, as it is done in Scripture, has something in it more just, as well as great, than all that the most fanciful Poet could have bestowed upon her in the richness of his imagination.

Milton has shewn a wonderful art in describing that variety of passions which arose in our first Parents upon the breach of the Commandment that had been given them. We see them gradually passing from the triumph of their Guilt through Remorse, Shame, Despair, Contrition, Prayer, and Hope, to a perfect and compleat Repentance. At the end of the tenth book they are represented as prostrating themselves upon the ground, and watering the earth with their tears: to which the Poet joins this beautiful circumstance, that they offer'd up their penitential prayers on the very place where their Judge appeared to them when he pronounced their sentence.

They forthwith to the place
Repairing where he judg'd them, prostrate fell
Before him reverent, and both confess'd
 Humbly their faults, and pardon bidd'd, with tears
 Watering the ground—

There
There is a beauty of the same kind in a Tragedy of Sophocles, where Oedipus, after having put out his own eyes, instead of breaking his neck from the palace battlements (which furnishes so elegant an entertainment for our English Audience) defies that he may be conducted to Mount Citharon, in order to end his life in that very place where he was exposed in his infancy, and where he should then have died, had the Will of his parents been executed.

As the Author never fails to give a poetical turn to his sentiments, he describes in the beginning of this book the acceptance which these their prayers met with, in a short Allegory formed upon that beautiful passage in holy Writ: And another Angel came and stood at the Altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all Saints upon the golden Altar, which was before the Throne: and the smoke of the incense which came with the prayers of the Saints ascended up before God.

—To heav'n their prayers
Flew up, nor mis'd the way by envious winds
Blown vagabond or frustrate: in they pas'd Dimensionless through heavy doors, then clad
With incense, where the golden Altar s'mod,
By their great Intercessor, came in sight
Before the Father's throne——

We have the same thought expressed a second time in the intercession of the Messiah, which is conceived in very emphatic sentiments and expressions.

Among the poetical parts of Scripture which Milton has so finely wrought into this part of his narration, I must not omit that wherein Ezekiel speaking of the Angels who appeared to him in a vision, adds, that every one had four faces, and that their whole bodies, and their backs, and their hands, and their wings were full of eyes round about.

—The Cohort bright
Of watchful Cherubim; four faces each
Had, like a double Janus, all their shape
Spangled with eyes——

The assembling of all the Angels of heaven to hear the solemn decree passed upon man, is represented in very lively ideas. The Almighty is here described as remembering Mercy in the midst of Judgment, and commanding

manding Michael to deliver his message in the mildest terms, least the spirit of man, which was already broken with the sense of his Guilt and Misery, should fall before him.

--- Yet lest they faint.
At the sad sentence rigorously urg’d,
(For I behold them softened, and with tears Bewailing their excess) all terror hide.

The conference of Adam and Eve is full of moving sentiments. Upon their going abroad after the melancholy night which they had passed together, they discover the Lion and the Eagle pursuing each of them their prey towards the eastern gates of Paradise. There is a double beauty in this incident, not only as it presents great and just Omens, which are always agreeable in Poetry, but as it expresses that Enmity which was now produced in the animal creation. The Poet, to shew the like changes in nature, as well as to grace his Fable with a noble prodigy, represents the Sun in an eclipse. This particular incident has like-wise a fine effect upon the imagination of the Reader, in regard to what follows; for at the same time that the Sun is under an eclipse, a bright cloud descends in the western quarter of the heavens, filled with an host of Angels, and more luminous than the Sun itself. The whole Theatre of Nature is darkened, that this glorious Machine may appear in all its lustre and magnificence.

--- Why in the east,
Darkness o’er day’s mid-course, and morning light
More orient in that western cloud that draws O’er the blue firmament a radiant white;
And slow descends, with something heavenly fraught?
He err’d not, for by this the heavenly bands
Down from a sky of jasper lighted now
In Paradise, and on a hill made halt;
A glorious apparition.—

I need not observe how properly this Author, who always suits his parts to the Actors whom he introduces, has employed Michael in the expulsion of our first Parents from Paradise. The Archangel on this occasion neither appears in his proper shape, nor in that familiar manner with which Raphael the sociable spirit entertained the Father of mankind before fore the Fall. His person, his port, and behaviour are suitable to a spirit of the highest rank, and exquisitely described in the following passage.

—To Archangel from drew nigh,
Not in his shape celestial, but as man
Cad to meet man; over his lucid arms
A military veil of purple flow'd
Livelier than Meliboeus, or the grain
Of Sarrus, worn by Kings and Heroes old
In time of Truce; Iris had dip'd the woof.
His starry helm, unbuckled, shew'd him prime
In manhood where youth ended, by his side
As in a glistening zodiac hung the sword,
Satan's dire dread, and in his hand the spear.
Adam bow'd low: he kingly from his state
Inclined not, but his coming Thus declared.

Eve's complaint upon hearing that she was to be removed from the Garden of Paradise is wonderfully beautiful: the sentiments are not only proper to the subject, but have something in them particularly fit and womanish.

Must I then leave thee, Paradise? thus leave
Thee, native soil, thee happy walks and shades,
Fit haunt of Gods? where I had hope to spend Quiet, though sad, the vestige of that day
That must be mortal to us both. O flow'res
That never will in other climate grow,
My early visitation and my last
At even, which I bred up with tender hand
From the first opening bud, and gave you names;
Who now shall rear you to the Sun, or rank
Your tribes, and water from th' ambrosial fount?
Thee, lastly, nuptial bower, by me adorn'd
With what to fight or fuel was sweeter: from thee
How shall I part, and whither wander down
Into a lower world, to this obsolete
And cold, how shall we breathe in other air
Leafor pure, accustomed to immortal fruits?

Adam's
Adam's speech abounds with thoughts which are equally moving, and of a more masculine and elevated turn. Nothing can be conceived more sublime and poetical than the following passage in it.

This most afflicts me, that departing hence
As from his face I shall be hid, deprived
His blessed countenance; here I could frequent,
With worship, place by place where he vouchsafed
Presence divine, and to my sons relate,
On this mount be appear'd, under this tree
Stood visible, among these pines his voice
I heard, here with him at this fountain talk'd:
So many grateful Altars I would rear
Of grassy turf, and pile up every stone
Of larges from the brook, in memory
Or monument to ages, and thereon
Offer sweet smelling gums and fruits and flowers.
In yonder nether world where shall I seek
His bright appearances, or footsteps trace?
For though I fled him angry, yet recall'd
To life prolong'd and promised race, I now
Gladly behold though on his utmost skirts
Of glory, and far off his steps adore.

The Angel afterwards leads Adam to the highest mount of Paradise, and lays before him a whole Hemisphere, as a proper stage for those visions which were to be represented on it. I have before observed how the plan of Milton's Poem is in many particulars greater than that of the Iliad or Æneid. Virgil's Hero, in the last of those Poems, is entertained with a fight of all those who are to descend from him; but though that Episode is justly admired as one of the noblest designs in the whole Æneid, every one must allow that this of Milton is of a much higher nature. Adam's vision is not confined to any particular tribe of mankind, but extends to the whole species.

In this great review which Adam takes of all his sons and daughters, the first object he is presented with exhibits to him the story of Cain and Abel, which is drawn together with much closeness and propriety of expression. That curiosity and natural horror which arises in Adam at the sight of the first dying man, is touched with great beauty.

But have I now seen Death? Is this the way
I must return to native dust? Of
Of terror foul and ugly to behold,
Horrid to think, how horrible to feel!

The second vision sets before him the image of Death in a great variety of appearances. The Angel, to give him a general idea of those effects which his guilt had brought upon his pollity, places before him a large Hospital, or Lazar-house, fill’d with persons lying under all kinds of mortal diseases. How finely has the Poet told us that the sick persons languished under lingering and incurable distempers, by an apt and judicious use of such imaginary Beings as those I mentioned in my last paper.

Dire was the tossing, deep the groans; Despair
Tended the sick, busy from couch to couch;
And over them triumphant Death his dart
Shook, but delay’d to strike, though oft invoked
With vows as their chief good and final hope.

The passion which likewise rives in Adam on this occasion is very natural.

Sight so deform what heart of rock could long Dry-eyed behold? Adam could not, but wept,
The bower of woman born; compassion quell’d
His best of man, and gave him up in tears.

The discourse between the Angel and Adam which follows, abounds with noble morals.

As there is nothing more delightful in poetry than a contrast and opposition of incidents, the Author, after this melancholy prospect of death and sickness, raises up a scene of mirth, love, and jollity. The secret pleasure that steals into Adam’s heart as he is intent upon this vision, is imagined with great delicacy. I must not omit the description of the looie female troupe, who seduced the sons of God, as they are called in scripture.

For that fair female troupe thou saw’st, that seem’d
Of Goddesses, so blithe, so smooth, so gay,
Yet empty of all good, wherein consists Woman’s domestic honour and chief praise;
Bred only and compleated to the taste
Of servile appetite, to sing, to dance,

To
To dress and trounce the tongue; and rout the eye,
To those that sober race of men, whose lives
Religious titled them the sons of God,
Shall yield up all their virtue, all their fame
Glory to the trains and to the smiles
Of those fair Arbeiss——

The next vision is of a quite contrary nature, and filled with the horrors of war. Adam at the sight of it melts into tears, and breaks out in that passionate speech,

———
O what are these
Death’s ministers, not men: who thus deal death
Inhumanly to men, and multiply
Ten thousand fold the sin of him who slew
His brother: for of whom such massacre
Make they but of their brethren, men of men?

Milton, to keep up an agreeable variety in his Visions, after having raised in the mind of his Reader the several ideas of terror which are conformable to the description of war: passes on to those softer images of triumphs and festivities, in that vision of levities and luxury which utters in the flood.

As it is visible that the Poet had his eye upon Ovid’s account of the universal Deluge, the Reader may observe with how much judgment he has avoided every thing that is redundant or puerile in the Latin Poet. We do not here see the wolf swimming among the sheep, nor any of those wanton imaginations which Seneca found fault with, as unbecoming the great catastrophe of Nature. If our Poet has imitated that verse in which Ovid tells us that there was nothing but sea, and that this sea had no shore to it, he has not set the thought in such a light as to incur the censure which Critics have passed upon it. The latter part of that verse in Ovid is idle and superfluous, but just and beautiful in Milton.

Ni nihil pontus erat, deorsum quoque litora ponto.

———
Sea cover’d sea,

Milton.

In Milton the former part of the description does not forestall the latter. How much more great and solemn on this occasion is that which follows in our English Poet,———

And
And in their palaces
Where luxury late reign'd, sea monsters wheel'd
And stabled

than that in Ovid, where we are told that the Sea-calves lay in those places where the goats were used to browse? The Reader may find several other parallel passages in the Latin and English description of the Deluge, wherein our Poet has visibly the advantage. The sky's being over-charged with clouds, the descending of the rains, the rising of the seas, and the appearance of the rainbow, are such descriptions as every one must take notice of. The circumstance relating to Paradise is so finely imagined and suitable to the opinions of many learned Authors, that I cannot forbear giving it a place in this paper.

Then shall this mount
Of Paradise by might of waves be mov'd
Out of his place, push'd by the bornd flood,
With all his verdure spoil'd, and trees adrift
Down the great river to the opening gulf;
And there take root an island vast and bare,
The haunts of Seals and Orcs and Sea-mews clang.

The transition which the Poet makes from the vision of the Deluge, to the concern it occasioned in Adam, is exquisitely graceful, and copied after Virgil, though the first thought it introduces is rather in the spirit of Ovid.

How drift thou grieve thou, Adam, to behold
The end of all thy offspring, end so sad, Depopulation; thee another flood
Of tears and sorrow, a flood thee also drown'd,
And sink thee as thy sons; 'til gently rear'd
By th' Angel, on thy feet thou foundst at last Though comfortless, as when a father mourns
His children, all in view destroy'd at once.

I have been the more particular in my quotations out of the eleventh book of Paradise lost, because it is not generally reckoned among the most shining books of this Poem; for which reason the Reader might be apt to overlook those many passages in it which deserve our admiration. The eleventh and twelfth are indeed built upon that single circumstance:
cumfluence of the removal of our first parents from Paradise; but though this is not in it itself so great a subject as that in most of the foregoing books, it is extended and diversified with so many surprizing incidents and pleasing Episodys, that these two last books can be no means be looked upon as unequal parts of this divine Poem. I must further add, that had not Milton represented our first parents as driven out of Paradise, his Fall of man would not have been compleat, and consequently his Action would have been imperfect.

Sequins irritant animos demissa per auves,
Quam que sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus——Hor.

Milton, after having represented in vision the history of mankind to the first great period of nature, dispatches the remaining part of it in narration. He has devis'd a very handsome reason for the Angel's proceeding with Adam after this manner; though doubtless the true reason was the difficulty which the Poet would have found to have shadowed out so mix'd and complicated a story in visible objects. I could wish, however, that the author had done it, whatever pains it might have cost him. To give my opinion freely, I think that the exhibiting part of the history of mankind in Vision, and part in Narrative, is as if an History-painter should put in colours one half of his subject, and write down the remaining part of it. If Milton's Poem flags any where, it is in this narration, where in some places the author has been so attentive to his divinity, that he has neglected his poetry. The narration, however, riseth very happily on several occasions, where the subject is capable of poetical ornaments, as particularly in the confusion which he describes among the builders of Babel, and in his short sketch of the plagues of Egypt. The storm of hail and fire, with the darkness that overpried the land for three days, are describ'd with great firenels. The beautiful passage which follows, is rais'd upon noble hints in scripture.
Thus with ten wounds
The river-dragon tamed at length submits
To let his sojourners depart, and rest
Humbles his stubborn heart, but still as ice
More harden'd after thaw: till in his rage
Pursuing whom he late dispos'd, the sea
Swallows him with his host, but them lets pass
As on dry land between two crystal walls,
And'd by the rod of Moses, so to stand Divided

The River-dragon is an allusion to the Crocodile, which inhabits the Nile, from whence Egypt derives her plenty. This allusion is taken from that sublime passage in Ezekiel, "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold I am against thee Pharaoh King of Egypt, the great Dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself." Milton has given us another very noble and poetical image in the same description, which is copied almost word for word out of the history of Moses.

All night he will pursue, but his approach,
Darkness defends between till morning watch;
Then thro' the fiery pillar and the cloud
God looking forth, will trouble all his host,
And craze their chariot-wheels: when by command
Moses once more his potent rod extends Over the sea; the sea his rod obeys;
On their embattel'd ranks the waves return
And overwhelm their war.

As the principal design of this Epistle was to give Adam an idea of the holy person, who was to re-instate humane nature in that happiness and perfection from which it had fallen, the Poet confines himself to the line of Abraham, from whence the Messiah was to descend. The Angel is described as leading the Patriarch actually travelling towards the Land of Promise, which gives a particular liveliness to this part of the narration.

I see him, but thou canst not, with what faith
He leaves his God, his friends, his native soil
Ur of Chaldea, passing now the ford

V O L. III.                               B b b
To Haran, after him a cumbrous train
Of herds and flocks and numerous servitude;
Not wand’ring poor, but trusting all his wealth
With God who call’d him, in a land unknown.
Canaan he now attains, I see his Tents
Pitch’d about Sechem, and the neighbouring plain
Of Moreh, there by promise he receives
Gift to his progeny of all that land,
From Hamath northward to the desert south,
(Things by their names I call, though yet unnam’d.)

As Virgil’s Vision in the sixth Æneid probably gave Milton the hint of this whole Episode, the last line is a translation of that verse, where Æchilles mentions the names of places, which they were to bear hereafter.

_Hae curn nomina erant, nunc sunt sine nomine terre._

The Poet has very finely represented the joy and gladness of heart which rife in Adam upon his discovery of the Messiah. As he sees his day at a distance through types and shadows, he rejoices in it; but when he finds the redemption of man compleated, and Paradise again renewed, he breaks forth in rapture and transport,

_O Goodness infinite, Goodness immense!_
_That all this good of evil shall produce, &c._

I have hinted in my sixth paper on Milton, that an Heroic Poem, according to the opinion of the best Critics, ought to end happily, and leave the mind of the Reader, after having conducted it through many doubts and fears, sorrows and disquietudes, in a state of tranquillity and satisfaction. Milton’s Fable, which had so many other qualifications to recommend it, was deficient in this particular. It is here therefore, that the Poet has shewn a most exquisite judgment, as well as the finest invention, by finding out a method to supply this natural defect in his subject. Accordingly he leaves the adversary of mankind, in the last view which he gives us of him, under the lowest state of mortification and disappointment. We see him chewing ashes, grovelling in the dust, and loaden with supernumerary pains and torments. On the contrary, our two first Parents are comforted by Dreams and Visions, chear’d with promises of salvation, and, in a manner, raised to a greater happiness than that which they had forfeited: In short, Satan is represented miserable in the height of his triumphs, and Adam triumphant in the height of misery.

_Milton’s_
Milton's Poem ends very nobly. The last speeches of Adam and the Arch-Angel are full of moral and instructive sentiments. The sleep that fell upon Eve, and the effects it had in quieting the disorders of her mind, produces the same kind of consolation in the Reader, who cannot peruse the last beautiful speech which is ascribed to the Mother of mankind, without a secret pleasure and satisfaction.

Whence thou return'st, and whither went'st, I know;
For God is also in sleep; and dreams advise,
Which be bath sent propitious, some great good Peregaging, since with sorrow and heart's distress
Wearied I fell asleep: but now lead on;
In me is no delay: with thee to go
Is to stay here; without thee here to stay
Is to go hence unwilling; thou to me
Art all things under heaven, all places thou
Who for my wilful crime art banish'd hence.
This further consolation yet secure
I carry hence; though all by me is lost,
Such favour I unworthy am vouchsafed,
By me the promised Seed shall all restore.

The following lines, which conclude the Poem, rise in a most glorious blaze of poetical images and expressions.

Heliodorus in his Aethiopis acquaints us, that the motion of the gods differs from that of mortals, as the former do not flit their feet, nor proceed step by step, but slide over the surface of the earth by an uniform swimming of the whole body. The Reader may observe with how poetical a description Milton has attributed the same kind of motion to the Angels who were to take possession of Paradise.

So spake our Mother Eve, and Adam heard
Well-pleas'd, but answer'd not; for now too nigh
Th' Arch-Angel stood, and from the other hill
To their fix'd station, all in bright array
The Cherubim descendent; on the ground
Gliding meteorous, as evening mild,
Rise from a river, o' er the marish glides,
And gathers ground fast at the laborer's heel
Homeward returning. High in front advances

The
The brandish'd sword of God before them blaz'd Fierce as a Comet——

The Author helped his invention in the following passage, by reflecting on the behaviour of the Angel, who, in holy Writ, has the conduct of Lot and his family. The circumstances drawn from that relation are very gracefully made use of on this occasion.

In either hand the hastening Angel caught
Our lingering Parents, and to the eastern gate
Led them direct; and down the cliff as fast.
To the subjefted plain; then disappear'd.
They looking back, &c.

The scene which our first Parents are surpriz'd with upon their looking back on Paradise, wonderfully strikes the Reader's imagination, as nothing can be more natural than the tears they shed on that occasion.

They looking back, all th' eastern side beheld
Of Paradise, so late their happy seat,
Wav'd o'er by that flaming brand, the gate
With dreadful faces throng'd and fiery arms:
Some natural tears they dropp'd, but wiped them soon.
The world was all before them, where to chose
Their place of rest, and Providence their guide.

If I might presume to offer at the smallest alteration in this divine work, I should think the Poem would end better with the passage here quoted, than with the two verses which follow.

They hand in hand with wandering steps and slow,
Through Eden took their solitary way.

These two verses, though they have their beauty, fall very much below the foregoing passage, and renew in the mind of the Reader that anguish which was pretty well laid by that consideration,

The world was all before them, where to chose
Their place of rest, and Providence their guide.

The number of books in Paradise Lost is equal to those of the Aeneid.
Our Author in his first edition had divided his Poem into ten books, but afterwards broke the seventh and the eleventh each of them into two different books, by the help of some small additions. This second division
division was made with great judgment, as any one may see who will be at the pains of examining it. It was not done for the sake of such a chimerical beauty as that of resembling Virgil in this particular, but for the more just and regular disposition of this great work.

Those who have read Boffo, and many of the Critics who have written since his time, will not pardon me if I do not find out the particular moral which is incultated in Paradise Lost. Though I can by no means think, with the last-mentioned French Author, that an Epic Writer first of all pitches upon a certain moral, as the ground-work and foundation of his Poem, and afterwards finds out a story to it: I am, however, of opinion, that no just Heroic Poem ever was, or can be made, from whence one great moral may not be deduced. That which reigns in Milton is the most universal and most useful that can be imagined; it is in short this, that obedience to the will of God makes men happy, and that disobedience makes them miserable. This is visibly the moral of the principal Fable which turns upon Adam and Eve, who continued in Paradise while they kept the Command that was given them, and were driven out of it as soon as they had transgressed. This is likewise the moral of the principal Epifode, which shews us how an innumerable multitude of Angels fell from their state of bliss, and were cast into hell, upon their disobedience. Besides this great moral, which may be looked upon as the soul of the Fable, there are an infinity of under morals which are to be drawn from the several parts of the Poem, and which makes this work more useful and instructive than any other Poem in any language.

Those who have criticised on the Odyssey, the Iliad, and Aeneid, have taken a great deal of pains to fix the number of months or days contained in the action of each of those Poems. If any one thinks it worth his while to examine this particular in Milton, he will find that from Adam's first appearance in the fourth book, to his expulsion from Paradise in the twelfth, the author reckons ten days. As for that part of the action which is described in the three first books, as it does not pass within the regions of nature, I have before observed that it is not subject to any calculations of time.

I have now finished my observations on a work which does an honour to the English nation. I have taken a general view of it under those four heads, the Fable, the Characters, the Sentiments, and the Language, and made each of them the subject of a particular paper. I have in the next place spoken of the Censure which our Author may incur under each of these heads, which I have confined to two papers, though I might have enlarged the number, if I had been disposed to dwell on so ungrateful a subject. I believe, however, that the severest Reader will not find any little fault in Heroic Poetry, which this Author has fallen into, that does not come under one of those heads among which I have distributed his several blemishes. After having thus treated at large of Paradise Lost, I could not think it sufficient to have celebrated this Poem in the whole, without descending to particulars. I have therefore bestowed a paper upon each book, and endeavoured not only to prove that the Poem is beautiful in general, but to point out its particular beauties, and to determine wherein they consist. I have endeavoured to shew how some passages are beautiful by being sublime; others by being soft; others by being natural: which of them are recommended by the passion; which by the moral; which by the sentiment; and which by the expression. I have likewise endeavoured to shew how the Genius of the Poet shines by a happy invention; a distant allusion; or a judicious imitation: how he has copied or improved Homer or Virgil, and raised his own imaginations by the use which he has made of several poetical passages in Scripture. I might have inserted also several passages of Tasso, which our Author has imitated; but as I do not look upon Tasso to be a sufficient Voucher, I would not perplex my Reader with such quotations, as might do more honour to the Italian than English Poet. In short, I have endeavoured to particularize those innumerable kinds of beauty, which it would be tedious to recapitulate, but which are essential to poetry, and which may be met with in the works of this great Author. Had I thought, at my first engaging in this design, that it would have led me to so great a length, I believe I should never have entered upon it; but the kind reception which it has met with among those whose judgments I have a value for, gives me no reason to repent of the pains I have been at in compounding them.

---Ævo rarissima nostro Simplicitas-----

Ov.

I was this morning surprized with a great knocking at the door, when my Landlady's daughter came up to me and told me there was a man below desired to speak with me. Upon my asking her who it was, she told me it was a very grave elderly person, but that she did not know his name. I immediately went down to him, and found him to be the coachman of my worthy friend Sir Roger de Coverly. He told me that his master came to town last night, and would be glad to take a turn with me in Grays-Inn walks. As I was wondering in my self what had brought Sir Roger to town, not having lately received any letter from him, he told me that his master was come up to get a sight of Prince Eugene, and that he desired I would immediately meet him.

I was not a little pleased with the curiosity of the old Knight, though I did not much wonder at it, having heard him say more than once in private discourse, that he looked upon Prince Eugenio (for so the Knight always calls him) to be a greater man than Scanderbeg.

I was no sooner come into Grays-Inn walks, but I heard my friend upon the Terrace hemming twice or thrice to himself with great vigour, for he loves to clear his pipes in good air (to make use of his own phrase) and is not a little pleased with any one who takes notice of the strength which he still exerts in his morning emms.

I was touched with a secret joy at the sight of the good old man, who before he saw me was engaged in conversation with a beggar man that had asked an alms of him. I could hear my friend chide him for not finding out some work; but at the same time saw him put his hand in his pocket and give him sixpence.

Our salutations were very hearty on both sides, consisting of many kind shakes of the hand, and several affectionate looks which we cast upon one another. After which the Knight told me my good friend his Chaplain was was very well, and much at my service, and that the Sunday before, he had made a most incomparable Sermon out of Doctor Barrow. I have left, says he, all my affairs in his hands, and being willing to lay an obligation upon him, have deposited with him thirty marks, to be distributed among his poor parishioners.

He then proceeded to acquaint me with the welfare of Will Wimble. Upon which he put his hand into his pocket and presented me in his name with a tobacco stopper, telling me that Will had been busy all the beginning of the winter in turning great quantities of them; and that he made a present of one to every Gentleman in the country who has good principles, and smokes. He added, that poor Will was at present under great tribulation, for that Tom Touchy had taken the law of him for cutting some hazel sticks out of one of his hedges.

Among other pieces of news which the Knight brought from his country seat, he informed me that Moll White was dead: and that about a month after her death the wind was so very high, that it blew down the end of one of his barns. But for my part, says Sir Roger, I do not think that the old woman had any hand in it.

He afterwards fell into an account of the diversions which had taken in his house during the holidays, for Sir Roger, after the laudable custom of his ancestors, always keeps open house at Christmas. I learned from him, that he had killed eight fat hogs for this feast, that he had dealt about his chines very liberally amongst his neighbours, and that in particular he had sent a string of hogs-puddings with a pack of cards to every poor family in the parish. I have often thought, says Sir Roger, it happens very well that Christmas should fall out in the middle of the winter. It is the most dead uncomfortable time of the year, when the poor people would suffer very much from their poverty and cold, if they had not good cheer, warm fires, and Christmas gambols to support them. I love to rejoice their poor hearts at this feast, and to see the whole village merry in my great hall. I allow a double quantity of malt to my small beer, and set it a running for twelve days to every one that calls for it. I have always a piece of cold beef and a mince-pye upon the table, and am wonderfully pleased to see my tenants pass away a whole evening in playing their innocent tricks, and musing one another. Our friend Will Wimble is as merry as any of them, and shews a thousand roguish tricks upon these occasions.

I was very much delighted with the reflection of my old friend, which carried so much goodness in it. He then launched out into the praise of the late Act of Parliament for securing the Church of England, and told me with great satisfaction, that he believed it already began to take effect; for that a rigid Dissenter, who chanced to dine at his house on Christmas day, had been observed to eat very plentifully of his plum-borridge.

After having dispatched all our country matters, Sir Roger made several enquiries concerning the club, and particularly of his old antagonist Sir Andrew Freepord. He asked me with a kind of smile, whether Sir Andrew had not taken the advantage of his absence, to vent among them some of his Republican doctrines; but soon after gathering up his countenance into a more than ordinary feriouness, Tell me truly, says he, don't you think Sir Andrew had a hand in the Pope's procession—but without giving me time to answer him, Well, well, says he, I know you are a wary man, and do not care to talk of publick matters.

The Knight then asked me, if I had seen Prince Eugene; and made me promise to get him a stand in some convenient place where he might have a full sight of that extraordinary man, whose presence does so much honour to the British nation. He dwelt very long on the praises of this great General, and I found that since I was with him in the country, he had drawn many observations together out of his reading in Baker's Chronicles, and other Authors, who always lie in his hall window, which very much redound to the honour of this Prince.

Having palled away the greatest part of the morning in hearing the Knight's reflections, which were partly private, and partly political, he asked me if I would smoke a pipe with him over a dish of Coffee at Squire's. As I love the old man, I take a delight in complying with everything that is agreeable to him, and accordingly waited on him to the Coffee-house, where his venerable figure drew upon us the eyes of the whole room. He had no sooner seated himself at the upper end of the high table, but he called for a clean pipe, a paper of Tobacco, a dish of Coffee, a wax candle, and the Supplement, with such an air of cheerfulness and good humour, that all the boys in the Coffee-room (who seemed to take pleasure in serving him) were at once employed on his several crands, insomuch that no body else could come at a dish of Tea, till the Knight had got all his conveniences about him.

Mille trabens variis adverso sole colores. Virg.

I receive a double advantage from the letters of my correspondents; first, as they shew me which of my papers are most acceptable to them; and in the next place, as they furnish me with materials for new Speculations. Sometimes indeed I do not make use of the letter itself, but form the hints of it into plans of my own invention; sometimes I take the liberty to change the language or thought into my own way of speaking and thinking, and always (if it can be done without prejudice to the sense) omit the many compliments and applause which are usually bestowed upon me.

Besides the two advantages above-mentioned, which I receive from the letters that are sent me, they give me an opportunity of lengthening out my paper by the skilful management of the subscribing part at the end of them, which perhaps does not a little conduce to the safe, both of my self and Reader.

Some will have it, that I often write to myself, and am the only punctual correspondent I have. This objection would indeed be material, were the letters I communicate to the publick stuffed with my own commendations, and if, instead of endeavouring to divert or instruct my Readers, I admired in them the beauty of my own performances. But I shall leave these wise conjectures to their own imaginations, and produce the three following letters for the entertainment of the day.

Sir,

I was last Thursday in an assembly of Ladies, where there were thirteen different coloured hoods. Your Spectator of that day, lying upon the table, they ordered me to read it to them, which I did, with a very clear voice, till I came to the Greek verse at the end of it. I must confess I was a little startled at its popping upon me so unexpectedly; however, I covered my confusion as well as I could, and after having having muttered two or three hard words to my self, laught heartily, and cryed, A very good Jeff, Faith. The Ladies desired me to explain it to them, but, I begg'd their pardon for that, and told them that if it had been proper for them to hear, they may be sure the Author would not have wrap it up in Greek. I then let drop severall expressions, as if there was something in it that was not fit to be spoken before a company of Ladies. Upon which the Matron of the assembly, who was dressed in a cherry-coloured hood, commended the discretion of the Writer, for having thrown his filthy thoughts into Greek, which was likely to corrupt but few of his Readers. At the same time the declared her self very well pleased, that he had not given a decisive opinion upon the new-fashion'd hoods; for to tell you truly, says she, I was afraid he would have made us ashamed to shew our heads. Now, Sir, you must know, since this unlucky accident happened to me in a company of Ladies, among whom I passed for a most ingenious man, I have consultted one who is very well versed in the Greek language, and he affires me upon his word, that your late quotation means no more, than that manners and not dress are the ornaments of a woman. If this comes to the knowledge of my female admirers, I shall be very hard put to it to bring my self off handomely. In the mean while I give you this account, that you may take care hereafter not to betray any of your well wishers into the like inconveniencies. It is in the number of these that I beg leave to subscribe my self,

Tom Trippit.

Mr Spectator,

"YOUR Readers are so well pleased with your character of Sir Roger de Coverly, that there appeared a sensible joy in every Coffee-house, upon hearing the old Knight was come to town. I am now with a knot of his admirers, who make it their joint request to you, that you would give us public notice of the window or balcony where the Knight intends to make his appearance. He has already given great satisfaction to severall who have seen him at Squire's Coffee-house. If you think fit to place your short face at Sir Roger's left elbow, we shall take the hint, and gratefully acknowledge so great a favour.

I am, SIR,

Your most devoted humble Servant, C. D.

Ccc2. SIR,
Sir,

Knowing you are very inquisitive after every thing that is curious in nature, I will wait on you if you please in the dusk of the evening, with my show upon my back, which I carry about with me in a box, as only consisting of a man, a woman, and an horse. The two first are married, in which state the little cavalier has so well acquitted himself, that his Lady is with child. The big-bellied woman, and her husband, with their whimsical palfry, are so very light, that when they are put together into a scale, an ordinary man may weigh down the whole family. The little man is a bully in his nature; but when he grows choleric I confine him to his box till his wrath is over, by which means I have hitherto prevented him from doing mischief. His horse is likewise very vicious, for which reason I am forced to tie him close to his manger with a pack-thread. The woman is a Coquet. She struts as much as it is possible for a Lady of two foot high, and would ruin me in bilks, were not the quantity that goes to a large pin-cushion sufficient to make her a gown and petticoat. She told me the other day, that she heard the Ladies wore coloured hoods, and ordered me to get her one of the finest blue. I am forced to comply with her demands while she is in her present condition, being very willing to have more of the same breed. I do not know what she may produce me, but provided it be a show I shall be very well satisfied. Such novelties should not, I think, be concealed from the British Spectator; for which reason I hope you will excuse this preoccupation.

Your most Dutiful, most Obedient,
and most humble Servant, S. T.

Tuesday.
I was yesterday engaged in an assembly of Virtuoso's, where one of them produced many curious observations which he had lately made in the Anatomy of a human body. Another of the company communicated to us several wonderful discoveries, which he had also made on the same subject, by the help of very fine glasses. This gave birth to a great variety of uncommon remarks, and furnished discourse for the remaining part of the day.

The different opinions which were started on this occasion presented to my imagination so many new ideas, that by mixing with those which were already there, they employed my fancy all the last night, and composed a very wild extravagant dream.

I was invited, methought, to the dissection of a Beau's head and of a Coquette's heart, which were both of them laid on a table before us. An imaginary Operator opened the first with a great deal of nicety, which upon a cursory and superficial view, appeared like the head of another man; but upon applying our glasses to it, we made a very odd discovery, namely, that what we looked upon as brains, were not such in reality, but an heap of strange materials wound up in that shape and texture, and packed together with wonderful art in the several cavities of the skull. For, as Homer tells us, that the blood of the gods is not real blood, but only something like it; so we found that the brain of a Beau is not a real brain, but only something like it.

The Tinenal Gland, which many of our modern Philosophers suppose to be the seat of the soul, is next very strong of Essence and Orange-flower water, and was encompassed with a kind of horney substance, cut into a thousand little faces or mirrors, which were imperceptible to the naked eye; insomuch that the soul, if there had been any here, must have been always taken up in contemplating her own beauties.
We observed a large Antrum or Cavity in the Sinus, that was filled with ribbons, lace and embroidery, wrought together in a most curious piece of Network, the parts of which were likewise imperceptible to the naked eye. Another of these Antrums or Cavities was suffused with invisible billet-doux, love-letters, pricked dances, and other trumpery of the same nature. In another we found a kind of powder, which set the whole company a trembling, and by the scent discovered itself to be right Spanish. The several other Cells were stored with commodities of the same kind, of which it would be tedious to give the Reader an exact inventory.

There was a large cavity on each side of the head, which I must not omit. That on the right side was filled with fictions, flatteries and falsehoods, vows, promises and protestations; that on the left with oaths and imprecations. There issued out a Duet from each of these Cells, which ran into the root of the tongue, where both joined together, and passed forward in one common Duet to the tip of it. We discovered several little roads or canals running from the ear into the brain, and took particular care to trace them out through their several passages. One of them extended itself to a bundle of Sonnets and little musical instruments. Others ended in several bladders which were filled with wind or froth. But the large canal entered into a great cavity of the skull, from whence there went another canal into the tongue. This great cavity was filled with a kind of spongy substance, which the French Anatomists call Galimatias, and the English, Nonence.

The skins of the forehead were extremely tough and thick, and what very much surprized us, had not in them any single blood-vessel that we were able to discover, either with or without our glasses; from whence we concluded, that the party when alive must have been entirely deprived of the faculty of blushing.

The Os Cribriforme was exceedingly ruffled, and in some places damp with snuff. We could not but take notice in particular of that small muscle, which is not often discovered in dissections, and draws the nose upwards, when it expresses the contempt which the owner of it has, upon seeing any thing he does not like, or hearing any thing he does not understand. I need not tell my learned Reader, this is that muscle which performs the motion so often mentioned by the Latin Poets, when they talk of a man's cocking his nose, or playing the Rhinoceros.

We did not find any thing very remarkable in the eye, saving only, that the Musculus Anamors, or, as we may translate it into English, the Oiling Muscles, Muscles were very much worn and decayed with use: whereas on the contrary, the Elevator, or the Muscle which turns the eye towards heaven, did not appear to have been used at all.

I have only mentioned in this divagation such new discoveries as we were able to make, and have not taken any notice of those parts which are to be met with in common heads. As for the skull, the face, and indeed the whole outward shape and figure of the head, we could not discover any difference from what we observe in the heads of other men. We were informed, that the person to whom this head belonged, had passed for a Man above five and thirty years; during which time he eat and drank like other people, dressed well, talked loud, laughed frequently, and on particular occasions had acquitted himself tolerably at a Ball or an Assembly; to which one of the company added, that a certain knot of Ladies took him for a Wit. He was cut off in the flower of his age by the blow of a paring-shovel, having been surprized by an eminent Citizen, as he was tending some civilities to his wife.

When we had thoroughly examined this head with all its apartments, and several kinds of furniture, we put up the brain, such as it was, into its proper place, and laid it aside under a broad piece of scarlet cloth, in order to be prepared, and kept in a great repository of divagations. Our Operator telling us that the preparation would not be so difficult as that of another brain, for that he had observed several of the little pipes and tubes which ran through the brain were already filled with a kind of mercurial substance, which he looked upon to be true Quick-silver.

He applied himself in the next place to the Coquette's heart, which he likewise laid open with great dexterity. There occurred to us many particularities in this divagation; but being unwilling to burden my Reader's memory too much, I shall reserve this subject for the Speculation of another day.
HAVING already given an account of the dissection of a Beau’s Head, with the several discoveries made on that occasion, I shall here, according to my promise, enter upon the dissection of a Coquette’s Heart, and communicate to the publick such particularities as we observed in that curious piece of Anatomy.

I should perhaps have waved this undertaking, had not I been put in mind of my promise by several of my unknown correspondents, who are very importunate with me to make an example of the Coquette, as I have already done of the Beau. It is therefore in compliance with the request of friends, that I have looked over the minutes of my former dream, in order to give the public an exact relation of it, which I shall enter upon without further preface.

Our Operator, before he engaged in this visionary dissection, told us, that there was nothing in his art more difficult, than to lay open the heart of a Coquette, by reason of the many labyrinths and recesses which are to be found in it, and which do not appear in the heart of any other animal.

He desired us first of all to observe the Pericardium, or outward case of the heart, which we did very attentively; and by the help of our glases discerned in it millions of little scars, which seemed to have been occasioned by the points of innumerable darts and arrows, that from time to time had glanced upon the outward coat; though we could not discover the smallest orifice, by which any of them had entered and pierced the inward substance.

Every matter in Anatomy knows, that this Pericardium, or case of the heart, contains in it a thin reddish liquor, supposed to be bred from the vapours which exhale out of the heart, and being poured here, are condened into this watry substance. Upon examining this liquor, we found that it had in it all the qualities of that spirit which is made use of in the Thermometer, to shew the change of weather.

Nor
Nor must I here omit an experiment one of the company assured us he himself had made with this liquor, which he found in great quantity about the heart of a Coquette whom he had formerly dexters. He affirmed to us, that he had actually enclosed it in a small Tube made after the manner of a weather-glass; but that instead of acquainting him with the variations of the Atmosphere, it shewed him the qualities of those persons who entered the room where it stood. He affirmed also, that it rose at the approach of a plume of feathers, an embroidered coat, or a pair of fringed gloves; and that it fell as soon as an ill shapped periwig, a clumsy pair of shoes, or an unfashionable coat came into his house; nay, he proceeded so far as to assure us, that upon his laughing aloud when he stood by it, the liquor mounted very tendingly, and immediately sunk again upon his looking serious. In short, he told us, that he knew very well by this invention whenever he had a man of sense or a coxcomb in his room.

Having cleared away the Pericardium, or the case and liquor above-mentioned, we came to the heart itself. The outward surface of it was extremely slippery, and the Musc, or point, so very cold withal, that upon endeavouring to take hold of it, it glided through the fingers like a smooth piece of ice.

The fibres were turned and twisted in a more intricate and perplexed manner than they are usually found in other hearts; inomuch that the whole heart was wound up together like a Gordian knot, and must have had very irregular and unequal motions, whilst it was employed in its vital function.

One thing we thought very observably, namely, that upon examining all the vessels which came into it or flowed out of it, we could not discover any communication that it had with the tongue.

We could not but take notice likewise, that several of those little nerves in the heart which are affected by the sentiments of love, hatred, and other passions, did not descend to this before us from the brain, but from the muscles which lie about the eye.

Upon weighing the heart in my hand, I found it to be extremely light, and consequently very hollow, which I did not wonder at when upon looking into the inside of it, I saw multitudes of cells and cavities running one within another, as our Historians describe the apartments of Rosamond's bower. Several of these little hollows were stuffed with innumerable sorts of trixes, which I shall forbear giving any particular account of, and shall therefore only take notice of what lay first and uppermost, which upon one unfolding it, and applying our Microscope to it, appeared to be a flame-coloured hood.
We were informed that the Lady of this house, when living, received the addresses of several who made love to her, and did not only give each of them encouragement, but made every one she conversed with believe that she regarded him with an eye of kindness; for which reason we expected to have seen the impression of multitudes of faces among the several places and foldings of the heart, but to our great surprize not a single print of this nature discovered it till we came into the very core and center of it. We there observed a little figure, which, upon applying our glasses to it, appeared dressed in a very fantastick manner. The more I looked upon it, the more I thought I had seen the face before, but could not possibly recollect either the place or time; when at length, one of the company, who had examined this figure more nicely than the rest, shewed us plainly by the make of its face, and the several turns of its features, that the little idol which was thus lodged in the very middle of the heart was the deceased Beau, whose head I gave some account of in my last Tuesday's paper.

As soon as we had finished our dissection, we resolved to make an experiment of the heart, not being able to determine among our selves the nature of its substance, which differed in so many particulars from that of the heart in other females. Accordingly we laid it into a pan of burning coals, when we observed in it a certain Salamandrine quality, that made it capable of living in the midst of fire and flame, without being consumed, or so much as singed.

As we were admiring this strange Phenomenon, and floundering round the heart in the circle, it gave a most prodigious sigh or rather crack, and dispers'd all at once in smoke and vapour. This imaginary noise, which methoughts was louder than the burst of a cannon, produced such a violent shake in my brain, that it dissipated the fumes of sleep, and left me in an instant broad awake.
Look upon it as a peculiar happiness, that were I to choose of what religion I would be, and under what government I would live, I should most certainly give the preference to that form of religion and government which is established in my own country. In this point I think I am determined by reason and conviction; but if I shall be told that I am actuated by prejudice, I am sure it is an honest prejudice, it is a prejudice that arises from the love of my country, and therefore such an one as I will always indulge. I have in several papers endeavoured to express my duty and esteem for the Church of England, and design this as an Essay upon the civil part of our Constitution, having often entertained my self with reflections on this subject, which I have not met with in other writers.

That form of government appears to me the most reasonable, which is most conformable to the equality that we find in human nature, provided it be consistent with publick peace and tranquillity. This is what may properly be called Liberty, which exempts one man from subjection to another, so far as the order and oeconomy of government will permit.

Liberty should reach every individual of a people, as they all share one common nature; if it only spreads among particular branches, there had better be none at all, since such a liberty only aggravates the misfortune of those who are deprived of it, by setting before them a disagreeable subject of comparison.

This liberty is best preferred, where the Legislative power is lodged in several persons, especially if those persons are of different ranks and interests; for where they are of the same rank, and consequently have an interest to manage peculiar to that rank, it differs but little from a despotic government in a single person. But the greatest security a people can have for their liberty, is when the Legislative power is in the hands of
of persons so happily distinguished, that by providing for the particular interest of their several ranks, they are providing for the whole body of the people; or in other words, when there is no part of the people that has not a common interest with at least one part of the Legislators.

If there but one body of Legislators, it is no better than a Tyranny; if there are only two, there will want a calling voice, and one of them must at length be swallowed up by disputes and contentions that will necessarily arise between them. Four would have the same inconvenience as two, and a greater number would cause too much confusion. I could never read a passage in Polybius, and another in Cicero, to this purpose, without a secret pleasure in applying it to the English constitution, which it suits much better than the Roman. Both these great Authors give the pre-eminence to a mixt government consisting of three branches, the Regal, the Noble, and the Popular. They had doubts in their thoughts the constitution of the Roman Common-wealth, in which the Consuls represented the King; the Senate, the Nobles; and the Tribunes the people. This division of the three powers in the Roman constitution was by no means so distinct and natural, as it is in the English form of government. Among several objections that might be made to it, I think the chief are those that affect the Consular power, which had only the ornaments without the force of the regal authority. Their number had not a calling voice in it; for which reason, if one did not chance to be employed abroad, while the other sat at home, the publick business was sometimes at a stand, while the Consuls pulled two different ways in it. Besides, I do not find that the Consuls had ever a negative voice in the passing of a law, or decree of Senate, so that indeed they were rather the chief body of the Nobility, or the first Ministers of State, than a distinct branch of the Sovereignty, in which none can be looked upon as a part, who are not a part of the Legislature. Had the Consuls been invested with the regal authority to as great a degree as our Monarchs, there would never have been any occasions for a Dictatorship, which had in it the power of the three orders, and ended in the subversion of the whole constitution.

Such an history as that of Suetonius, which gives us a succession of absolute Princes, is to me an unanswerable argument against Despotick power. Where the Prince is a man of wisdom and virtue, it is indeed happy for his people that he is absolute; but since in the common run of mankind, for one that is wise and good you find ten of a contrary character, it is very dangerous for a nation to stand by its chance, or to have its publick happiness or misery to depend on the virtues or vices of a single person.
Peron. Look into the historian I have mentioned, or into any series of absolute Princes, how many Tyrants must you read through, before you come at an Emperor that is supportable? But this is not all; an honest private man often grows cruel and abandoned, when converted into an absolute Prince. Give a man power of doing what he pleases with impunity, you extinguish his fear, and consequently overturn in him one of the great pillars of morality. This too we find confirmed by matter of fact. How many hopeful heirs apparent to great Empires, when in the possession of them, have become such monsters of lust and cruelty as are a reproach to human nature?

Some tell us we ought to make our governments on earth like that in heaven, which, say they, is altogether monarchical and unlimited. Was man like his Creator in goodness and justice, I should be for following this great model; but where goodness and justice are not essential to the ruler, I would by no means put my self into his hands to be disposed of according to his particular will and pleasure.

It is odd to consider the connection between despotic government and Barbarity, and how the making of one person more than man, makes the rest less. Above nine parts of the world in ten are in the lowest state of slavery, and consequently sunk into the most gross and brutish ignorance. European slavery is indeed a state of liberty, if compared with that which prevails in the other three divisions of the world; and therefore it is no wonder that those who grovel under it have many tracks of light among them, of which the others are wholly destitute.

Riches and plenty are the natural fruits of liberty, and where these abound, learning and all the liberal arts will immediately lift up their heads and flourish. As a man must have no slavish fears and apprehensions hanging upon his mind, who will indulge the flights of fancy or speculation, and push his researches into all the abstruse corners of truth; so it is necessary for him to have about him a competency of all the conveniences of life.

The first thing every one looks after, is to provide himself with necessaries. This point will engross our thoughts till it be satisfied. If this is taken care of to our hands, we look out for pleasures and amusements; and among a great number of idle people, there will be many whose pleasures will lie in reading and contemplation. These are the two great sources of knowledge, and as men grow wise they naturally love to communicate their discoveries; and others seeing the happiness of such a learned life, and improving by their conversation, emulate, imitate, and surpass one another, till a nation is filled with races of wise and understanding persons. Ease and plenty are therefore the great cherithers of knowledge; and as most of the despotic governments of the world have neither of them, they are naturally over-run with ignorance and barbarity. In Europe, indeed, notwithstanding several of its Princes are absolute, there are men famous for knowledge and learning, but the reason is because the subjects are many of them rich and wealthy; the Prince not thinking fit to exert himself in his full tyranny like the Princes of the Eastern nations, lest his subjects should be invited to new-mould their constitution, having so many prospects of liberty within their view. But in all despotic governments, though a particular Prince may favour arts and letters, there is a natural degeneracy of mankind, as you may observe from Augustus’s reign, how the Romans lost themselves by degrees till they fell to an equality with the most barbarous nations that surrounded them. Look upon Greece under its free States, and you would think its inhabitants lived in different climates, and under different heavens, from those at present; so different are the Genius’s which are formed under Turkish slavery, and Grecian liberty.

Besides poverty and want, there are other reasons that debase the minds of men, who live under slavery, though I look on this as the principal. This natural tendency of despotic power to ignorance and barbarity, though not inflicted upon by others, is, I think, an unanswerable argument against that form of government; as it shews how repugnant it is to the good of mankind and the perfection of human nature, which ought to be the great ends of all civil institutions.

N° 289. Thursday, January 31.

Vita summa brevis, spem nos vetat incoare longam. Hor.

UPON taking my seat in a Coffee-hous I often draw the eyes of the whole room upon me, when in the hottest seasons of News, and at a time that perhaps the Dutch mail is just come in, they hear me ask the Coffee-man for his last week’s bill of mortality: I find that I have been sometimes taken on this occasion for a Parish Sexton, sometimes for an Undertaker, and sometimes for a Doctor of physic. In this, however, I am guided by the spirit of a Philosopher, as I take occasion from hence to reflect upon the regular encrease and diminution of mankind, and consider the several various ways through which we pass from life to eternity. I am very well pleased with these weekly admonitions, that bring into my mind such thoughts as ought to be the daily entertainment of every reasonable creature; and can consider, with pleasure to my self, by which of those deliverances, or, as we commonly call them, dilemmas, I may possibly make my escape out of this world of sorrows, into that condition of existence, wherein I hope to be happier than it is possible for me at present to conceive.

But this is not all the use I make of the above-mentioned weekly paper. A Bill of Mortality is in my opinion an unanswerable argument for a Providence; how can we, without supposing ourselves under the constant care of a Supreme Being, give any possible account for that nice proportion which we find in every great city, between the deaths and births of its inhabitants, and between the number of males and that of females, who are brought into the world? What else could adjust in so exact a manner the recruiting of every nation to its losses, and divide these new supplies of people into such equal bodies of both sexes? Chance could never hold the balance with so steady a hand. Were we not counted out by an intelligent supervisor, we should sometimes be over-charged with multitudes, and at others waste away into a defect; we should sometimes be a populus virorum, as Florus elegantly expresses it, a generation of males; and at others a species of women. We may extend this consideration to every species of living creatures, and consider the whole animal world as an huge army made up of an innumerable corps, if I may use that term, whose quotas have been kept entire near five thousand years, in so wonderful a manner, that there is not probably a single species lost during this long tract of time. Could we have general Bills of Mortality of every kind of animal, or particular ones of every species in each continent and island, I could almost say in every wood, marsh or mountain, what astonishing instances would they be of that Providence which watches over all its works?

I have heard of a great man in the Roman Church, who upon reading those words in the fifth chapter of Genesis, And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years, and he died; and all the days of Seth were nine hundred and twelve years, and he died; and all the days of Methuselah were nine hundred and sixty nine years, and he died; immediately immediately shut himself up in a Convent, and retired from the world, as not thinking any thing in this life worth pursuing, which had not regard to another.

The truth of it is, there is nothing in history which is so improving to the Reader, as those accounts which we meet with of the deaths of eminent persons, and of their behaviour in that dreadful season. I may also add, that there are no parts in history which affect and please the Reader in so sensible a manner. The reason I take to be this, because there is no other single circumstance in the story of any person, which can possibly be the cause of every one who reads it. A Battle or a Triumph are conjunctions in which not one man in a million is likely to be engaged; but when we see a person at the point of death, we cannot forbear being attentive to everything he says or does, because we are sure, that some time or other we shall our selves be in the same melancholy circumstances. The General, the Statesman, or the Philosopher, are perhaps characters which we may never act in; but the dying man is one whom, sooner or later, we shall certainly resemble.

It is perhaps, for the same kind of reason that few books, written in English, have been so much perused as Doctor Sherlock's Discourse upon Death; though at the same time I must own, that he who has not perused this excellent Piece, has not perhaps read one of the strongest persuasions to a religious life that ever was written in any language.

The consideration, with which I shall close this Essay upon Death, is one of the most ancient and most beaten morals that has been recommended to mankind. But its being so very common, and so universally received, though it takes away from it the grace of novelty, adds very much to the weight of it, as it shews that it falls in with the general sense of mankind. In short, I would have every one consider, that he is in this life nothing more than a Passenger, and that he is not to set up his rest here, but keep an attentive eye upon that state of Being to which he approaches every moment, and which will be for ever fixed and permanent. This single consideration would be sufficient to extinguish the bitterness of Hatred, the thirst of Avarice, and the cruelty of Ambition.

I am very much pleased with the passage of Antiphanes; a very ancient Poet, who lived near an hundred years before Soranus, which represents the life of man under this view, as I have here translated it word for word. Be not grieved, says he, above measure for thy deceased friends. They are not dead, but have only finished that journey which it is necessary for every one of us to take: We our selves must go to that great place.
The place of reception in which they are all of them assembled, and in this general rendezvous of mankind, live together in another state of Being.

I think I have, in a former paper, taken notice of those beautiful Metaphors in Scripture, where life is termed a Pilgrimage; and those who pass through it are called Strangers and Sojourners upon earth. I shall conclude this with a story, which I have somewhere read in the Travels of Sir John Chardin; that Gentleman, after having told us, that the Inns which receive the Caravans in Persia, and the eastern countries, are called by the name of Caravan-faries, gives us a relation to the following purpose.

A Dervise, travelling through Tartary, being arrived at the town of Balk, went into the King's palace by a mistake, as thinking it to be a public Inn or Caravan-fary. Having looked about him for some time he entered into a long gallery, where he laid down his wallet, and spread his carpet; in order to repose himself upon it after the manner of the eastern nations. He had not been long in this posture before he was discovered by some of the guards, who asked him what was his business in that place?
The Dervise told them he intended to take up his right's lodging in that Caravan-fary. The guards let him know, in a very angry manner, that the house he was in, was not a Caravan-fary, but the King's palace.
It happened that the King himself passed through the gallery during this debate, and smiling at the mistake of the Dervise, asked him how he could possibly be so dull as not to distinguish a Palace from a Caravanfary? Sir, says the Dervise, give me leave to ask your Majesty a question or two. Who were the persons that lodged in this house when it was first built? the King replied, His Ancestors. And who, says the Dervise, was the last person that lodged here? the King replied, His Father. And who is it, says the Dervise, that lodges here at present? the King told him that it was he himself. And who, says the Dervise, will be here after you? the King answered, The young Prince his son. "Ah Sir," said
"the Dervise, a house that changes its inhabitants so often, and receives "such a perpetual succession of guests, is not a Palace but a Caravan-fary.
The famous Gratian, in his little book wherein he lays down maxims for a man's advancing himself at Court, advises his Reader to associate himself with the fortunate, and to shun the company of the unfortunate; which notwithstanding the baseness of the precept to an honest mind, may have something useful in it for those who pursue their interest in the world. It is certain a great part of what we call good or ill fortune, rifes out of right or wrong measures and schemes of life. When I hear a man complain of his being unfortunate in all his undertakings, I shrewdly suspect him for a very weak man in his affairs. In conformity with this way of thinking, Cardinal Richi-Ien used to say, that unfortunate and imprudent were but two words for the same thing. As the Cardinal himself had a great share both of prudence and good-fortune, his famous antagonist, the Count d'Olivares, was disgraced at the Court of Madrid, because it was alleged against him that he had never any success in his undertakings. This, says an eminent Author, was indirectly accusing him of imprudence.

Cicero recommended Pompey to the Romans for their General upon three accounts, as he was a man of courage, conduct, and good-fortune.
It was, perhaps, for the reason above-mentioned, namely, that a series of good-fortune supposes a prudent management in the person whom it be-fails, that not only Sulla the Dictator, but several of the Roman Emperors, as is still to be seen upon their Medals, among other titles, gave themselves that of Felix or Fortunate. The heathens, indeed, seem to have valued a man more for his good-fortune than for any other qua-131 lity, which I think is very natural for those who have not a strong belief of another world. For how can I conceive a man crowned with many distinguishing blessings, that has not some extraordinary fund of merit and perfection in him, which lies open to the upream eye, though perhaps it is not discovered by my observation? What is the reason Homer's and Virgil's
Virgil's Heroes do not form a resolution, or strike a blow, without the conduct and direction of some Deity: doubtless because the Poets esteemed it the greatest honour to be favoured by the Gods, and thought the best way of praising a man was, to recount those favours which naturally implied an extraordinary merit in the person on whom they descended.

Those who believe a future state of rewards and punishments, act very absurdly, if they form their opinions of a man's merit from his successes. But certainly, if I thought the whole circle of our Being was concluded between our births and deaths, I should think a man's good-fortune the measure and standard of his real merit, since Providence would have no opportunity of rewarding his virtue and perfections, but in the present life. A virtuous unbeliever, who lies under the pressure of misfortunes, has reason to cry out, as they say Brutus did a little before his death, O Virtue, I have worshipped thee as a substantial good, but I find thou art an empty name.

But to return to our first point. Though prudence does undoubtedly in a great measure produce our good or ill fortune in the world, it is certain there are many unforeseen accidents and occurrences, which very often pervert the finest schemes that can be laid by human wisdom. The race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. Nothing less than infinite wisdom can have an absolute command over fortune; the highest degree of it which man can possess, is by no means equal to fortuitous events, and to such contingencies as may rise in the prosecution of our affairs. Nay, it very often happens, that prudence, which has always in it a great mixture of caution, hinders a man from being so fortunate as he might possibly have been without it. A person who only aims at what is likely to succeed, and follows closely the dictates of human prudence, never meets with those great and unforeseen successes, which are often the effect of a fawning temper, or a more happy temper; and this perhaps may be the reason, that according to the common observation, Fortune, like other Females, delights rather in favouring the young than the old.

Upon the whole, since man is so short-sighted a creature, and the accidents which may happen to him so various, I cannot but be of Dr. Tillotson's opinion in another case, that were there any doubt of a Providence, yet it certainly would be very desirable there should be such a Being of infinite wisdom and goodness, on whose direction we might rely in the conduct of humane life.
It is a great presumption to ascribe our successes to our own management, and not to esteem ourselves upon any blessing, rather as it is the bounty of heaven, than the acquisition of our own prudence. I am very well pleased with a Medal which was struck by Queen Elizabeth a little after the defeat of the invincible Armada, to perpetuate the memory of that extraordinary event. It is well known how the King of Spain, and others, who were enemies of that great Prince, to derogate from her glory, ascribed the ruin of their fleet rather to the violence of storms and tempests, than to the bravery of the English. Queen Elizabeth, in stead of looking upon this as a diminution of her honour, valued herself upon such a signal favour of Providence, and accordingly in the reverse of the Medal above-mentioned, has represented a fleet beaten by a tempest, and falling foul upon one another, with that religious inscription, Affavit Deus & dissipantur. He blow with his Wind, and they were scattered.

It is remarked of a famous Grecian General, whose name I cannot at present recollect, and who had been a particular favourite of Fortune, that upon recounting his victories among his friends, he added at the end of several great actions, And in this Fortune had no share. After which it is observed in history, that he never prospered in any thing he undertook.

As arrogance, and a conceitedness of our own abilities, are very shocking and offensive to men of sense and virtue, we may be sure they are highly displeasing to that Being who delights in a humble mind, and by several of his dispensations seems purposely to shew us, that our own schemes or prudence have no share in our advancements.

Since on this subject I have already admitted several quotations which have occurred to my memory upon writing this Paper, I will conclude it with a little Persian Fable. A drop of water fell out of a cloud into the sea, and finding it itself lost in such an immensity of fluid matter, broke out into the following reflection: "Alas! what an inconsiderable creature am I in this prodigious ocean of waters! my existence is of no concern to the universe, I am reduced to a kind of nothing, and am less than the least of the works of God." It so happened, that an oyster, which lay in the neighbourhood of this drop, chanced to gaze and swallow it up in the midst of this his humble soliloquy. The drop, lays the Fable, lay a great while hardening in the shell, until by degrees it was ripened into a pearl, which falling into the hands of a diver, after a long series of adventures, is at present that famous pearl which is fixed on the top of the Persian Diadem.

Thursday,
Mr. Spectator,

I am turned of my great climacteric, and am naturally a man of a "meek temper. About a dozen years ago I was married, for my "sins, to a young woman of a good family, and of an high spirit; "but could not bring her to clothe with me, before I had entered into a "treaty with her longer than that of the grand Alliance. Among other "articles, it was therein stipulated, that she should have 400l. a year for "Pin-money, which I obliged myself to pay quarterly into the hands of "one who acted as her Plenipotentiary in that affair. I have ever since "religiously observed my part in this solemn agreement. Now, Sir, so "it is, that the Lady has had several children since I married her; to "which, if I should credit our malicious neighbours, her Pin-money has "not a little contributed. The education of these my children, who, "contrary to my expectation, are born to me every year, frightens me "so much that I have begged their mother to free me from the obliga-"tion of the above-mentioned Pin-money, that it may go towards making "a provision for her family. This proposal makes her noble blood swell "in her veins, indomuch that finding me a little tardy in her last quar-"ter's payment, she threatens me every day to arrest me; and proceeds "so far as to tell me, that if I do not do her justice, she shall dye in a jaylor. "To this she adds, when her passion will let her argue calmly, that she "has several play-debts on her hand, which must be discharged very sud-"denly, and that she cannot lose her money as becomes a woman of her "fashion, fashion, if she makes me any abatements in this article. I hope, Sir, you will take an occasion from hence to give your opinion upon a subject which you have not yet touched, and inform us if there are any precedents for this usage among our ancestors; or whether you find any mention of Pin-money in Grotius, Puffendorf, or any other of the Civilians.

I am ever the humblest of your Admiring, Josiah Fribble, Esq.

As there is no man living who is a more professed advocate for the fair sex than I, and that there is none that would be more unwilling to invade any of their ancient rights and privileges. But as the doctrine of Pin-money is of a very late date, unknown to our great grandmothers, and not yet received by many of our modern Ladies, I think it is for the interest of both sexes to keep it from spreading.

Mr. Fribble may not, perhaps, be much mistaken where he intimates, that the supplying a man’s wife with Pin-money, is furnishing her with arms against himself, and in a manner becoming necessary to his own dishonour.
We may, indeed, generally observe, that in proportion as a woman is more or less beautiful, and her husband advanced in years, she finds it necessary to have more or less number of Pins, and upon a treaty of marriage, rites or falls in her demands accordingly. It must likewise be owned, that high quality in a Mistress does very much inflame this article in the marriage reckoning.

But where the age and circumstances of both parties are pretty much upon a level, I cannot but think the insisting upon Pin-money is very extraordinary; and yet we find several matches broken off upon this very head. What would a foreigner, or one who is a stranger to this practice, think of a Lover that forsakes his Mistress, because he is not willing to keep her in Pins; or what would he think of the Mistress, should she be informed that she asks five or six hundred pounds a year for this use? Should a man unaccustomed with our customs be told the sums which are allowed in Great Britain, under the title of Pin-money, what a prodigious consumption of Pins would he think there was in this island?
A Pin a day, says our frugal proverb, is a great a year; so that according to this calculation, my friend Fribble’s wife must every year make use of eight millions six hundred and forty thousand new Pins.

I am not ignorant that our British Ladies allude they comprehend under this general term several other conveniences of life; I could therefore with, for the honour of my country-women, that they had rather called it Needle-money, which might have implied something of goodhousewifry, and not have given the malicious world occasion to think, that drefs and trifle have always the uppermoft place in a woman's thoughts.

I know several of my fair Readers urge, in defence of this practice, that it is but a necessary provision to make for themselves, in cafe their husband proves a churl or a miser; fo that they consider this allowance is a kind of Alimony, which they may lay their claim to without actually separating from their husbands. But withSubmission, I think a woman who will give up her fel£ to a man in marriage, where there is the least room for such an apprehension, and truft her person to one whom she will not rely on for the common necessaries of life, may very properly be accused (in the phrase of an homely proverb) of being penny wife and pound foolish.

It is observed of over-cautious Generals, that they never engage in a battel without securing a retreat, in cafe the event should not anfwer their expectations; on the other hand, the greatest Conquerors have burnt their fhips, and broke down the bridges behind them, as being determined either to succeed or die in the engagement. In the fame manner I should very much fufpect a woman who takes fuch precautions for her retreat, and contrives methods how she may live happily, without the affection of one to whom she joins her felf for life. Separate pures, between man and wife, are, in my opinion, as unnatural as fe-parate beds. A marriage cannot be happy, where the pleafures, inclu-dinations, and interests of both parties are not the fame. There is no greater incitement to love in the mind of man, than the feele of a perfon's depending upon him for her ease and happiness; as a woman loves all her endeavours to please the perfon whom she looks upon as her honour, her comfort, and her support.

For this reafon I am not very much surprized at the behaviour of a rough country Squire, who, being not a little shocked at the proceeding of a young widow that would not recede from her demands of Pin-mony, was fo enraged at her mercenary temper, that he told her in great wrath, "As much as she thought him her flave, he would flew all the world he did not care a pin for her. Upon which he flew out of the room, and never saw her more.

Socrates,
Socrates, in Plato's Alcibiades, says, he was informed by one, who had travelled through Persia, that as he passed over a tract of land, and enquired what the name of the place was, they told him it was the Queen's girdle; to which he adds, that another wide field which lay by it, was called the Queen's veil, and that in the same manner there was a large portion of ground set aside for every part of her Majesty's dress. These lands might not be improperly called the Queen of Persia's Pin-money.

I remember my friend, Sir Roger, who I dare say never read this passage in Plato, told me some time since, that upon his courting the perversé widow (of whom I have given an account in former papers), he had disposed of an hundred acres in a Diamond-ring, which he would have presented her with, had she thought fit to accept it, and that upon her wedding-day she should have carried on her head fifty of the tallest Oaks upon his estate. He further informed me that he would have given her a Colepit to keep her in clean linen, that he would have allowed her the profits of a Windmill for her fans, and have presented her, once in three years, with the sheering of his sheep for her under-petticoats. To which the Knight always adds, that though he did not care for fine cloaths himself, there should not have been a woman in the country better drest than my Lady Coverly. Sir Roger, perhaps, may in this, as well as in many other of his devices, appear something odd and singular, but if the humour of Pin-money prevails, I think it would be very proper for every Gentleman of an estate to mark out to many acres of it under the title of The Pins.

Tuesday,
It is observed, that a man improves more by reading the story of a person eminent for prudence and virtue, than by the finest rules and precepts of morality. In the same manner a representation of those calamities and misfortunes which a weak man suffers from wrong measures, and ill-concerted schemes of life, is apt to make a deeper impression upon our minds, than the wisest maxims and instructions that can be given us, for avoiding the like follies and indiscretions in our own private conduct. It is for this reason that I lay before my reader the following letter, and leave it with him to make his own use of it, without adding any reflections of my own upon the subject-matter.

Mr. Spectator, "Having carefully perused a letter sent you by Josiah Fribble, Esq: with your subsequent discourse upon pin-money, I do presume to trouble you with an account of my own case, which I look upon to be no less deplorable than that of Squire Fribble. I am a person of no extraction, having begun the world with a small parcel of rusty iron, and was for some years commonly known by the name of Jack Aviewport. I have naturally a very happy Genius for getting money, inasmuch that by the age of five and twenty I had scraped together four thousand two hundred pounds, five shillings, and a few odd pence. I then launched out into considerable business, and became a bold trader both by sea and land, which in a few years raised me a very considerable fortune. For these my good services I was knighted in the thirty fifth year of my age, and lived with great dignity among my City-neighbours by the name of Sir John Anvill. Being in my temper very ambitious, I was now bent upon making a family, and accordingly resolved that my descendants should have a dash of good blood in their veins. In order to this I made love to the Lady Mary Oddly, an indigent young woman of Quality. To cut short the mar-rriage treaty, I threw her a Chartre Blanche, as our newspapers call it, defining her to write upon it her own terms. She was very conci er demands, insisting only that the disposal of my fortune, and the regulation of my family, should be entirely in her hands. Her father and brothers appeared exceedingly averse to this match, and would not see me for some time; but at present are so well reconciled, that they dine with me almost every day, and have borrowed considerable sums of me; which my Lady Mary very often twists me with, when she would show me how kind her relations are to me. She had no Portion, as I told you before, but what she wanted in fortune, she makes up in spirit. She at first changed my name to Sir John Enville, and at present writes her self Mary Enville. I have had some children by her, whom she has christened with the Surname of her family, in order, as she tells me, to wear out the homines of their parentage by the father's side. Our eldest son is the honourable Oddly Enville, Esq.; and our eldest daughter Harriot Enville. Upon her first coming into my family, she turned off a parcel of very careful servants, who had been long with me, and introduced in their stead a couple of Black-a-moors, and three or four very genteel fellows in laced livretts, beside her French-woman, who is perpetually making noise in the house in a language which no body understands, except my Lady Mary. She next let her self to reform every room of my house, having glazed all my chimney-pieces with looking-glass, and planted every corner with such heaps of China, that I am obliged to move about my own house with the greatest caution and circumspection, for fear of hurting some of our brittle furniture. She makes an illumination once a week with wax-candles in one of the largest rooms, in order, as she phrases it, to see company. At which time she always defies me to be abroad, or to confine my self to the cock-loft, that I may not disgrace her among her visitants of quality. Her footmen, as I told you before, are such beaus, that I do not much care for asking them questions; when I do, they answer me with a fawcy grown, and say that every thing, which I find fault with, was done by my Lady Mary's
"Mary's order. She tells me that she intends they shall wear swords with their next liveries, having lately observed the footmen of two or three persons of Quality hanging behind the coach with swords by their sides. As soon as the first honey-moon was over, I represented to her the unreasonableness of these daily innovations which she made in my family; but she told me I was no longer to consider myself as Sir John Avis's, but as her husband; and added, with a frown, that I did not seem to know who she was. I was surprised to be treated thus, after such familiarities as had passed between us. But she has since given me to know, that whatever freedoms she may sometimes indulge me in, she expects in general to be treated with the respect that is due to her birth and quality. Our children have been trained up from their infancy with so many accounts of their mother's family, that they know the stories of all the great men and women it has produced. Their mother tells them, that such an one commanded in such a sea engagement, that their great Grandfather had a horse shot under him at Edgehill, that their Uncle was at the siege of Buda, and that her mothor danced in a ball at court with the Duke of Monmouth; with abundance of fiddle-faddle of the same nature. I was, the other day, a little out of countenance at a question of my little daughter Harriot, who asked me, with a great deal of innocence, why I never told them of the generals and admirals that had been in my family. As for my eldest son Oddly, he has been so spirited up by his mother, that if he does not mend his manners I shall go near to disinherit him. He drew his sword upon me before he was nine years old, and told me, that he expected to be used like a gentleman; upon my offering to correct him for his insolence, my Lady Mary kept in between us, and told me, that I ought to consider there was some difference between his mother and mine. She is perpetually finding out the features of her own relations in every one of my children, though, by the way, I have a little chub-faced boy as like me as he can be, if I durst say so;
but what most angers me, when she sees me playing with any of them upon my knee, she has begged me more than once to converse with the children as little as possible, that they may not learn any of my awkward tricks.

"You must farther know, since I am opening my heart to you, that she thinks herself superior in sense, as much as she is in quality, and therefore treats me like a plain well-meaning man, who does not know the world. She dictates to me in my own business, sets me right in point of trade, and if I disagree with her about any of my ships at sea, wonders that I will dispute with her, when I know very well that her great grandfather was a Flag officer.

To compleat my sufferings, she has scolded me this quarter of a year last past, to remove into one of the Squares at the other end of the town, promising, for my encouragement, that I shall have as good a Cock-loft as any Gentleman in the Square; to which the honourable Oddly Enville, Esq; always adds, like a Jack-a-napes as he is, that he hopes it will be as near the Court as possible.

In short, Mr. Spectator, I am so much out of my natural element, that to recover my old way of life I would be content to begin the world again, and be plain Jack Enville; but alas! I am in for life, and am bound to subscribe my self, with great sorrow of heart.

Your humble Servant, John Enville, Knb.

No 305. Tuesday, February 19.

Non tali auxilio, nec defenderibus iis Tempus eget--------- Virg.

Our late News-papers being full of the project now on foot in the Court of France, for establishing a Political Academy, and I myself having received Letters from several Virtuoso's among my foreign correspondents, which give some light into that affair, I intend to make it the subject of this day's Speculation. A general account of this project may be met with in the Daily Courant of last Friday in the following words, translated from the Gazette of Amsterdam.

Paris, February 12. "It is confirmed, that the King has resolved to establish a new Academy for Politics, of which the Marques de Torcy, Minister and Secretary of State, is to be protector. Six Academicians are to be chosen, endowed with proper talents, for beginning to form this Academy, into which no person is to be admitted under twenty twenty five years of age; they must likewise have each an estate of two thousand livres a year, either in possession, or to come to them by inheritance. The King will allow to each a pension of a thousand livres. They are likewise to have able masters to teach them the necessary Sciences, and to instruct them in all the Treaties of Peace, Alliance, and others which have been made in several Ages past. These members are to meet twice a week at the Louvre. From this Seminary are to be chosen Secretaries to Ambassadors, who by degrees may advance to higher employments.

Cardinal Richelieu's Politicks made France the terror of Europe. The Statemen who have appeared in that nation of late years, have on the contrary rendered it either the pity or contempt of its neighbours. The Cardinal erected that famous Academy which has carried all the parts of polite learning to the greatest height. His chief design in that institution was to divert the men of Genius from meddling with Politics, a province in which he did not care to have any one else to interfere with him. On the contrary, the Marquis de Torcy seems resolved to make several young men in France as wise as himself; and is therefore taken up at present in establishing a nursery of state men.

Some private Letters add, that there will also be erected a Seminary of Petticoat Politicians, who are to be brought up at the feet of Madam de Maintenon, and to be dispatched into foreign Courts upon any emergencies of state; but as the news of this last project has not been yet confirmed, I shall take no farther notice of it.

Several of my Readers may doubtless remember that upon the conclusion of the last war, which had been carried on so successfully by the enemy, their Generals were many of them transformed into Ambassadors; but the conduct of those who have commanded in the present war, has, it seems, brought so little honour and advantage to their great Monarch, that he is resolved to trust his affairs no longer in the hands of those military Gentlemen.

The regulations of this new Academy very much deserve our attention. The Students are to have in possession, or reversion, an estate of two thousand French livres per Annum, which, as the present exchange runs, will amount to at least one hundred and twenty six pounds English. This with the Royal allowance of a thousand livres, will enable them to find themselves in Coffee and Snuff; not to mention News-papers, Pen and Ink, Wax and Wafers, with the like necessaries for Politicians.
A man must be at least five and twenty before he can be initiated into the mysteries of this Academy; though there is no question but many grave persons of a much more advanced age, who have been constant readers of the Paris Gazette, will be glad to begin the world anew, and enter themselves upon this lift of politicians.

The Society of these hopeful young gentlemen is to be under the direction of six professors, who, it seems, are to be speculative statesmen, and drawn out of the body of the Royal Academy. These five professors, according to my private letters, are to have the following parts allotted them.

The first is to instruct the students in State Legerdemain, as how to take off the impression of a seal, to split a wafer, to open a letter, to fold it up again, with other the like ingenious feats of dexterity and art. When the students have accomplished themselves in this part of their profession, they are to be delivered into the hands of their second instructor, who is a kind of Posture-master.

This art is to teach them how to nod judiciously, to shrug up their shoulders in a dubious case, to connive with either eye, and in a word, the whole practice of Political Grinace.

The third is a sort of Language-master, who is to instruct them in the style proper for a foreign minister in his ordinary discourse. And to the end that this college of statesmen may be thoroughly practised in the political style, they are to make use of it in their common conversations, before they are employed either in foreign or domestic affairs. If one of them asks another, what a clock is, the other is to answer him indirectly, and, if possible, to turn off the question. If he is desirous to change a Louis d'or, he must beg time to consider of it. If it be enquired of him, whether the king is at Versailles or Marly, he must answer in a whisper. If he be asked the news of the last Gazette, or the subject of a proclamation, he is to reply, that he has not yet read it; or if he does not care for explaining himself so far, he needs only draw his brow up in wrinkles, or elevate the left shoulder.

The fourth professor is to teach the whole art of political characters and hieroglyphics; and to the end that they may be perfect also in this practice, they are not to send a note to one another (though it be but to borrow a Tacitus or a Machiavel) which is not written in cypher.

Their fifth professor, it is thought, will be chosen out of the society of Jesuits, and is to be well read in the controversies of probable doctrines, mental reservations, and the rights of princes. This learned man... is to instruct them in the grammar, syntax, and construing part of Treatise Latin; how to distinguish between the spirit and the letter, and likewise demonstrate how the same form of words may lay an obligation upon any Prince in Europe, different from that which it lays upon his Most Christian Majesty. He is likewise to teach them the art of finding flaws, loopholes, and evasions, in the most solemn compact, and particularly a great Rabbinical Secret, revived of late years by the fraternity of Jesuits, namely, that contradictory interpretations of the same article, may both of them be true and valid.

When our Statesmen are sufficiently improved by these several Instructors, they are to receive their last polishing from one who is to act among them as Master of the Ceremonies. This Gentleman is to give them lectures upon those important points of the Elbow Chair, and the Stair-head, to instruct them in the different situations of the right-hand, and to furnish them with bows and inclinations of all sizes, measures and proportions. In short, this Professor is to give the society their stiffening, and infuse into their manners that beautiful political lank, which may qualify them for Levées, Conferences, Visits, and make them shine in what vulgar minds are apt to look upon as trifles.

I have not yet heard any further particulars, which are to be observed in this Society of unfeathered Statesmen; but I must confess, had I a son of five and twenty, that should take it into his head at that age to set up for a Politician, I think I should go near to disinherit him for a block-head. Besides, I should be apprehensive lest the same arts which are to enable him to negotiate between Potentates, might a little infect his ordinary behaviour between man and man. There is no question but these young Machiavels will, in a little time, turn their College upside-down with plots and stratagems, and lay as many schemes to circumvent one another in a frog or a fall, as they may hereafter put in practice to over-reach a neighbouring Prince or State.

We are told that the Spartans, though they punished theft in their young men when it was discovered, looked upon it as honourable if it succeeded. Provided the conveyance was clean and unsuspected, a youth might afterwards boast of it. This, say the Historians, was to keep them sharp, and to hinder them from being imposed upon, either in their public or private negotiations. Whether any such relaxations of morality, such little jeux d'esprit, ought not to be allowed in this intended Seminary of Politicians, I shall leave to the wisdom of their Founder.
In the mean time we have fair warning given us by this doughty body of statesmen; and as Sylla saw many Marius's in Caesar, so I think we may discover many Torty's in this college of Academicians. Whatever we think of our selves, I am afraid neither our Smyrna or St. James's will be a match for it. Our Coffee-houses are, indeed, very good institutions, but whether or no thes our British schools of politics may furnish out as able Envoys and Secretaries as an Academy that is set apart for that purpose, will deserve our serious consideration; especially if we remember that our country is more famous for producing men of integrity than Statesmen; and that on the contrary, French truth and British policy makes a conspicuous figure in Nothing, as the Earl of Rochester has very well observed in his admirable poem upon that barren subject.

N° 311. Tuesday, February 26.

Nec Veneris phareis macer est; aut lampade servoxs:
Inde faces ardent, ventum a dote fugitum.
Juv.

Mr. Spectator,

I am amazed that among all the variety of characters, with which you have enriched your Speculations, you have never given us a picture of those audacious young fellows among us, who commonly go by the name of Fortune-stealers. You must know, Sir, I am one who live in a continual apprehension of this sort of people, that lye in wait, day and night, for our children, and may be considered as a kind of kidnappers within the law. I am the father of a young heiress, whom I begin to look upon as marriageable, and who has looked upon her self as such for above these six years. She is now in the eighteenth year of her age. The Fortune-hunters have already cast their eyes upon her, and take care to plant themselves in her view whenever she appears in any public assembly. I have my self caught a young Jack-a-napes, with a pair of silver fringed gloves, in the very fact. You must know, Sir, I have kept her as a prisoner of state ever since she was in her teens. Her chamber windows are cross-barred, she is not permitted permitted to go out of the house but with her keeper, who is a slave d a relation of my own; I have likewise forbid her the use of pen and ink for this twelve months past, and do not suffer a box to be carried into her room before it has been searched. Notwithstanding these precautions, I am at my wits end for fear of any sudden surprize.
There were, two or three nights ago, some riddles heard in the street, which I am afraid portend me no good; not to mention a tall Irish man, that has been walking before my house more than once this winter. My kinwoman likewise informs me, that the girl has talked to her twice or thrice of a gentleman in a fair wig, and that she loves to go to church more than ever she did in her life. She gave me the flip about a week ago, upon which my whole house was in alarm. I immediately dispatched a hue and cry after her to the Change, to her mantua-maker, and to the young Ladies that visit her; but after above an hour’s search she returned of herself, having been taking a walk, as she told me, by Rosamond’s pond. I have hereupon turned off her woman, doubled her guards, and given new instructions to my relation, who, to give her her due, keeps a watchful eye over all her morions. This, Sir, keeps me in a perpetual anxiety, and makes me very often watch when my daughter sleeps, as I am afraid she is even with me in her turn. Now, Sir, what I would desire of you is, to represent to this fluttering tribe of young fellows, who are for making their fortunes by these indirect means, that stealing a man’s daughter for the false of her portion, is but a kind of tolerated robbery; and that they make but a poor amends to the father, whom they plunder after this manner, by going to bed with his child. Dear Sir, be speedy in your thoughts on this subject; that, if possible, they may appear before the disbanding of the army.

I am, Sir, Your most humble Servant, Tim. Watchwell.

Themistocles, the great Athenian General, being asked whether he would chuse to marry his daughter to an indigent man of merit, or to a worthless man of an estate, replied, that he would prefer a man without an estate, to an estate without a man. The worst of it is, our modern fortune-hunters are those who turn their heads that way, because they are good for nothing else. If a young fellow finds he can make nothing of Cook and Littleton, he provides himself with a ladder of ropes, and by that means very often enters upon the premises.

The
The same art of dealing has likewise been practis'd with good success by many military engineers. Stratagems of this nature make parts and industry superfluous, and cut short the way to riches.

Nor is vanity a less motive than idleness to this kind of mercenary pursuit. A Fop who admires his person in a glass, soon enters into a resolution of making his fortune by it, not questioning but every woman that falls in his way will do him as much justice as he does himself. When an helsref sees a man throwing particular graces into his eye, or talking loud within her hearing, she ought to look to her self; but if withal she observes a pair of red-heels, a patch, or any other particularity in his dress, she cannot take too much care of her person. There are not to be trifled with, charms that have done a world of execution, and made their way into hearts which have been thought impregnable. The force of a man with these qualifications is so well known, that I am credibly informed there are several female undertakers about the Change, who upon the arrival of a likely man out of a neighbouring kingdom, will furnish him with proper dress from head to foot, to be paid for at a double price on the day of marriage.

We must however distinguish between fortune-hunters and fortune-sealers. The first are those affidious gentlemen who employ their whole lives in the chase, without ever coming at the quarry. Suffenus has combed and powdered at the Ladies for thirty years together, and taken his stand in a side box, 'till he is grown wrinkled under their eyes. He is now laying the same snares for the present generation of beauties, which he practis'd on their mothers. Cassius, after having made his applications to more than you meet with in Mr. Cowley's ballad of mistress, was at last imitated in a city lady of 3000L. sterling; but died of old age before he could bring matters to bear. Nor must I here omit my worthy friend Mr. Honeycomb, who has often told us in the club, that for twenty years successively, upon the death of a childless rich man, he immediately drew on his boots, called for his horse, and made up to the widow. When he is rallied upon his ill success, Will with his usual gaiety tells us, that he always found her pre-engaged.

Widows are indeed the great game of your fortune-hunters. There is scarce a young fellow in the town of six foot high, that has not paused in review before one or other of these wealthy reliques. Hudibras's Cupid, who took his stand

Upon a widow's jointure land.
is daily employed in throwing darts, and kindling flames. But as for widows, they are such a noble generation of people, that they may be left to their own conduct; or if they make a false step in it, they are answerable for it to no body but themselves. The young innocent creatures who have no knowledge and experience of the world, are those whose safety I would principally confide in this speculation. The luring of such an one should, in my opinion, be as punishable as a rape. Where there is no judgment, there is no choice; and why the inveigling a woman before she is come to years of discretion, should not he as criminal as the seducing of her before she is ten years old, I am at a loss to comprehend.

AUGUSTUS, a few moments before his death, asked his friends who stood about him, if they thought he had acted his part well; and upon receiving such an answer as was due to his extraordinary merit, Let me then, says he, go off the stage with your applause; using the expression with which the Roman Actors made their Exit at the conclusion of a Dramatic piece. I could wish that men, while they are in health, would consider well the nature of the part they are engaged in, and what figure it will make in the minds of those they leave behind them: whether it was worth coming into the world for, whether it be suitable to a reasonable Being; in short, whether it appears graceful in this life, or will turn to an advantage in the next. Let the sycophant, or buffoon, the satyr, or the good companion, consider with himself, when his body shall be laid in the grave, and his soul pass into another state of existence, how much it will redound to his praise to have it said of him, that no man in England eat better, that he had an admirable talent at turning his friend into ridicule, that no body out-did him at an ill-natured jest, or that he never went to bed before he had dispatched his third bottle. These are, however, very common funeral orations, and...
Elogiums on deceased persons who have acted among mankind with some figure and reputation.

But if we look into the bulk of our species, they are such as are not likely to be remembered a moment after their disappearance. They leave behind them no traces of their existence, but are forgotten as though they had never been. They are neither wanted by the poor, regretted by the rich, nor celebrated by the learned. They are neither missed in the Commonwealth, nor lamented by private persons. Their actions are of no significance to mankind, and might have been performed by creatures of much less dignity, than those who are distinguished by the faculty of reason. An eminent French Author speaks somewhere to the following purpose: I have often seen from my chamber-window two noble creatures, both of them of an erect countenance, and endowed with reason. These two intellectual beings are employed from morning to night, in rubbing two smooth stones one upon another; that is, as the vulgar phrase it, in polishing marble.

My friend, Sir Andrew Frequent, as we were sitting in the club last night, gave us an account of a sober citizen, who died a few days since. This honest man being of greater consequence in his own thoughts, than in the eye of the world, had for some years past kept a journal of his life. Sir Andrew shewed us one week of it. Since the occurrences let down in it mark out such a road of action as that I have been speaking of, I shall present my Reader with a faithful copy of it; after having first informed him, that the deceased person had in his youth been bred to trade, but finding himself not so well turned for business, he had for several years past lived altogether upon a moderate annuity.

Monday, eight a clock. I put on my cloaths and walked into the parlour.

Nineteen a clock. Tied my knee-sling, and washed my hands.

Hours ten, eleven and twelve. Smoked three pipes of Virginia. Read the Supplement and Daily Courant. Things go ill in the north. Mr. Nishby’s opinion thereupon.

One a clock in the afternoon. Chid Ralph for mislaying my tobacco-box.

Two a clock. Sate down to dinner. Mem. Too many plumbs, and no fowl.

From three to four. Took my afternoon’s nap.

From four to six. Walked into the fields. Wind, S. S. E.
From six to ten. At the club. Mr. Nisby's opinion about the peace.
Ten a clock. Went to bed, slept sound.

TUESDAY, being HOLIDAY, eight a clock. Rose as usual.
Nine a clock. Washed hands and face, shaved, put on my double foiled shoes.
Ten, eleven, twelve. Took a walk to Islington.
One. Took a pot of mother Cob's mild.
Between two and three. Returned, dined on a knuckle of veal and bacon. Mem. Sprouts wanting.
Three. Nap as usual.
From four to six. Coffee-house. Read the news. A dith of twiff.
Grand Vizier strangled.
From six to ten. At the club. Mr. Nisby's account of the great Turk.

WEDNESDAY, eight a clock. Tongue of my shoe-buckle broke.
Hands but not face.
Nine. Paid off the Butcher's bill. Mem. To be allowed for the last leg of mutton.
Ten, eleven. At the coffee-house. More work in the north. Stranger, in a black wig asked me how flocks went.
From twelve to one. Walked in the fields. Wind to the south.
From one to two. Smoked a pipe and a half.
Two. Dined as usual. Stomach good.
Three. Nap broke by the falling of a pewter dish. Mem. Cook-maid in love, and grown careless.
From four to six. At the coffee-house. Advice from Smyrna, that the grand Vizier was first of all strangled, and afterwards beheaded.
Six a clock in the evening. Was half an hour in the club before any body else came. Mr. Nisby of opinion that the grand Vizier was not strangled the first instant.
Ten at night. Went to bed. Slept without waking till nine next moring.

THURSDAY, nine a clock. Staid within till two a clock for Sir Timothy. Who did not bring me my annuity according to his promise.
Two in the afternoon. Sat down to dinner. Loss of appetite. Small beef tourn. Beef overconcerned.

Three.
Could not take my nap.
Four and five. Gave Ralph a box on the ear. Turned off my cookmaid. Sent a message to Sir Timothy. Mem. I did not go to the club to night. Went to bed at nine a clock.

Friday. Passed the morning in Meditation upon Sir Timothy, who was with me a quarter before twelve.

Twelve a clock. Bought a new head to my cane, and a tongue to my buckle. Drank a glass of purl to recover appetite.

Two and three. Dined, and slept well.

From four to six. Went to the coffee-house. Met Mr. Nisby there. Smoked several pipes. Mr. Nisby of opinion that laced coffee is bad for the head.

Six a clock. At the club as Steward. Sat late.

Twelve a clock. Went to bed, dreamt that I drank small-beer with the grand Vizer.

Saturday. Waked at eleven, walked in the fields, wind N. E.

Twelve. Caught in a shower.

One in the afternoon. Returned home, and dried my self.

Two. Mr. Nisby dined with me. First course marrow-bones, second ox cheeks, with a bottle of Brooks and Hellier.

Three a clock. Overlept my self.

Six. Went to the club. Like to have fallen into a gutter. Grand Vizer certainly dead.

I question not, but the Reader will be surprized to find the above-mentioned journal taking so much care of a life that was filled with such inconsiderable actions, and received so very small improvements; and yet, if we look into the behaviour of many whom we daily converse with, we shall find that most of their hours are taken up in those three important articles of eating, drinking, and sleeping. I do not suppose that a man loses his time, who is not engaged in publick affairs, or in an illusrious course of action. On the contrary, I believe our hours may very often be more profitably laid out in such transactions as make no figure in the world, than in such as are apt to draw upon them the attention of mankind. One may become wiser and better by several methods of employing ones self in secrecy and silence, and do what is laudable without noise, or ostentation. I would, however, recommend to every one of my Readers, the keeping a journal of their lives for one week, and setting down punctually their whole series of employments, during that space of time. This kind of self-examination would give them a true state of themselves, and incline them to consider seriously what they are about. One day would rectifie the omissions of another, and make a man weigh all those indifferent actions, which, though they are easily forgotten, must certainly be accounted for.

N° 323. Tuesday, March 11.

---modo vir, modo semina---

Virg.

The Journal with which I presented my Reader on Tuesday last, has brought me in several letters, with accounts of many private lives cast into that form. I have the rake's journal, the sor's journal, the whore-master's journal, and among several others a very curious piece, entitled, The Journal of a Mocha. By these instances I find that the intention of my last Tuesday's paper has been mistaken by many of my Readers. I did not design so much to expose Vice as idleness, and aimed at those persons who pass away their time rather in trifles and impertinence, than in crimes and immoralities. Offences of this latter kind are not to be dallied with, or treated in so ludicrous a manner. In short, my Journal only holds up folly to the light, and shews the disagreeableness of such actions as are indifferent in themselves, and blameable only as they proceed from creatures endowed with reason.

My following correspondent, who calls her self Clarinda, is such a Journalist as I require: the seems by her Letter to be placed in a modish state of indifference between vice and virtue, and to be susceptible of either, were there proper pains taken with her. Had her Journal been filled with gallantries, or such occurrences as had shewn her wholly divested of her natural innocence, notwithstanding it might have been more pleasing to the generality of readers, I should not have published it; but as it is only the picture of a life filled with a fashionable kind of gaiety and laziness, I shall set down five days of it, as I have received it from the hand of my correspondent.

Dear
Dear Mr. Spectator,

You having set your readers an exercise in one of your last week's papers, I have performed mine according to your orders, and herewith send it you enclosed. You must know, Mr. Spectator, that I am a maiden Lady of a good fortune, who have had several matches offered me for these ten years past, and have at present warm applications made to me by a very pretty fellow. As I am at my own disposal, I come up to town every winter, and pass my time in it after the manner you will find in the following Journal, which I began to write upon the very day after your Spectator upon that subject.

Tuesday Night. Could not go to sleep till one in the morning for thinking of my Journal.

Wednesday. From eight till ten. Drank two dishes of chocolate in bed, and fell asleep after them.

From ten to eleven. Eat a slice of bread and butter, drank a dish of bohea, read the Spectator.

From eleven to one. At my toilette, try'd a new head. Gave orders for Vony to be combed and washed. Mem. I look best in blue.

From one till half an hour after two. Drove to the Change. Cheaped a couple of fans.

Till four. At dinner. Mem. Mr. Froth puff'd by in his new liveries.

From four to six. Drest, paid a visit to old Lady Blithe and her sister, having before heard they were gone out of town that day.

From six to eleven. At ballet. Mem. Never sat again upon the ace of diamonds.

Thursday. From eleven at night to eight in the morning. Dreamed that I punt'd to Mr. Froth.

From eight to ten. Chocolate. Read two acts in Aurensche 2-bed.

From ten to eleven. Tea-table. Sent to borrow Lady Faddles Cupid for Vony. Read the play-bills. Received a letter from Mr. Froth. Mem. Looked it up in my strong box.

Rest of the morning. Toutange, the tire-woman, her account of my Lady Blithe's wash. Broke a tooth in my little tortoise-shell comb. Sent Frank to know how my Lady Hedrick resided after her monkey's leaping out at window. Looked pale. Toutange tells me my glass is not true. Drest by three.

From three to four. Dinner cold before I sat down.
From four to eleven. Saw company. Mr. Froth's opinion of Milton.
His account of the Mobocks. His fancy for a pin-cushion. Picture in the lid of his fruit-box. Old Lady Faddle promiscues me her woman to cut my hair. Loit five guineas at crimp.

Twelve a clock at night. Went to bed.

Friday. Eight in the morning. Abed. Read over all Mr. Froth's letters. Cupid and Vexy.
Ten a clock. Stay'd within all day, not at home.
From ten to twelve. In conference with my mantua-maker. Sorted a suit of ribbands. Broke my blue china cup.
From twelve to one. Shut myself up in my chamber, prais'd Lady Betsy Modesby's skettle.
One in the afternoon. Called for my flowered handkerchief. Worked half a violet-leaf in it. Eyes ask'd and head out of order. Threw by my work, and read over the remaining part of Aurengzebe.
From three to four. Dined.
From four to twelve. Changed my mind, drest, went abroad, and played at crimp till midnight. Found Mrs. Spitey at home. Conversation. Mrs. Brillant's necklace false stones. Old Lady Loveday going to be married to a young fellow that is not worth a groat. Miss Price gone into the country. Tom Townley has red hair. Mem. Mrs. Spitey whisper'd in my ear that she had something to tell me about Mr. Froth,
I am sure it is not true.

Between twelve and one. Dreamed that Mr. Froth lay at my feet, and called me Indamora.

Saturday. Rose at eight a clock in the morning. Sat down to my toilette.
From eight to nine. Shifted a patch for half an hour before I could determine it. Fixed it above my left eyebrow.
From nine to twelve. Drank my tea, and drested.
From twelve to two. At chappel. A great deal of good company.
Mem. The third air in the new opera. Lady Blithe drest frightfully.
From three to four. Dined. Mrs. Kitti called upon me to go to the Opera before I was riten from table.
From dinner to six. Drank tea. Turned off a footman for being rude to Vexy.
Six a clock. Went to the Opera. I did not see Mr. Froth till the be-ving of the second act. Mr. Froth talked to a gentleman in a black wig.

Vol. III.

wig. Bowed to a Lady in the front box. Mr. Froth and his friend clapped Nicollini in the third Act. Mr. Froth cried out Ancora. Mr. Froth led me to my chair. I think he squeezed my hand.

Eleven at night. Went to bed. Melancholy dreams. Methought Nicollini said he was Mr. Froth.

Sunday. Indisposed.

Monday. Eight a clock. Walked by Miss Kitty. Anzenzebe lay upon the chair by me. Kitty repeated without book the eight best lines in the play. Went in our mobbs to the dumb man, according to appointment. Told me that my lover's name began with a G. Mom. The Conjurer was within a letter of Mr. Froth's name, &c.

"Upon looking back into this my Journal, I find that I am at a loss to know whether I pass my time well or ill; and indeed never thought of considering how I did it, before I perused your Speculation upon that subject. I scarce find a single action in these five days that I can truly approve of, except the working upon the violet-leaf, which I am resolved to finish the first day I am at leisure. As for Mr. Froth and Vony, I did not think they took up so much of my time and thoughts, as I find they do upon my Journal. The latter of them I will turn off if you insist upon it; and if Mr. Froth does not bring matters to a conclusion very suddenly, I will not let my life run away in a dream.

Your Humble Servant, Clarinda.

To resume one of the morals of my first paper, and to confirm Clarinda in her good inclinations, I would have her consider what a pretty figure she would make among posterity, were the history of her whole life published like these five days of it. I shall conclude my paper with an epitaph written by an uncertain author on Sir Philip Sidney's father, a Lady who seems to have been of a temper very much different from that of Clarinda. The last thought of it is so very noble, that I dare say my reader will pardon the quotation.

On the Countess Dowager of Pembroke.

Underneath this marble heart:
Lies the subject of all verse:
Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother;
Death e'er thou hast kill'd another;
Fair and learn'd, and good as she;
Time shall throw a dart at thee.

_Tuesday._
MY friend Sir Roger de Coverly told me the other night, that he had been reading my paper upon Westminster-Abby, in which, says he, there are a great many ingenious fancies. He told me at the same time, that he observed I had promised another paper upon the Tombs, and that he should be glad to go and see them with me, not having visited them since he had read history. I could not at first imagine how this came into the Knight's head, till I recollected that he had been very busy all last summer upon Baker's Chronicle, which he has quoted several times in his dispute with Sir Andrew Freepont since his last coming to town. Accordingly I promised to call upon him the next morning, that we might go together to the Abbey.

I found the Knight under his Butler's hands, who always flaves him. He was no sooner dressed, than he called for a glass of the widow Trusley's water, which he told me he always drank before he went abroad. He recommended to me a dram of it at the same time, with so much heartiness, that I could not forbear drinking it. As soon as I had got it down, I found it very unpalatable; upon which the Knight observing that I had made several wry faces, told me that he knew I should not like it at first, but that it was the best thing in the world against the stone or gravel.

I could have wished indeed that he had acquainted me with the virtues of it sooner; but it was too late to complain, and I knew what he had done was out of good-will. Sir Roger told me further, that he looked upon it to be very good for a man whilst he flowed in town, to keep off infection, and that he got together a quantity of it upon the first news of the sickness being at Danzig: when of a sudden turning short to one of his servants, who stood behind him, he bid him call a hackney-coach, and take care it was an elderly man that drove it.

H h h 2  He
He then resumed his discourse upon Mrs. Truchy's water, telling me that the widow Trueby was one who did more good than all the Doctors and Apothecaries in the country; that she distilled every poppy that grew within five miles of her, that she distributed her water gratis among all sorts of people; to which the Knight added, that she had a very great jointure, and that the whole country would gain have it a match between him and her; and truly, says Sir Roger, if I had not been engaged, perhaps I could not have done better.

His discourse was broken off by his man's telling him he had called a coach. Upon our going to it, after having cast his eye upon the wheels, he asked the coach-man if his axletree was good; upon the fellow's telling him he would warrant it, the Knight turned to me, told me he looked like an honest man, and went in without further ceremony.

We had not gone far, when Sir Roger popping out his head, call'd the coachman down from his box, and upon his presenting himself at the window, asked him if he smook'd; as I was considering what this would end in, he bid him stop by the way at any good Tobacconist's, and take in a roll of their best Virginia. Nothing material happened in the remaining part of our journey, till we were let down at the west end of the Abbey.

As we went up the body of the church, the Knight pointed at the trophies upon one of the new monuments, and cry'd out, A brave man I warrant him! passing afterwards by Sir Cloudly Shovel, he flung his hand that way, and cry'd Sir Cloudly Shovel! a very gallant man! As we stood before Busby's tomb, the Knight uttered himself again after the same manner, Dr. Busby, a great man! he whip'd my grandfather; a very great man! I should have gone to him myself, if I had not been a blockhead; a very great man!

We were immediately conducted into the little chapel on the right hand. Sir Roger planting himself at our Historian's elbow, was very attentive to every thing he said, particularly to the account he gave us of the Lord who had cut off the King of Morocco's head. Among several other figures, he was very well pleased to see the Statesman Cecil upon his knees; and, concluding them all to be great men, was conduct'd to the figure which represents that Martyr to goodhou'wifry, who died by the pricks of a needle. Upon our Interpreter's telling us, that she was a Maid of Honour to Queen Elizabeth, the Knight was very inquisitive into her name and family; and after having regarded her finger for some time, I wonder, says he, that Sir Richard Baker has said nothing of her in his Chronicle.
We were then conveyed to the two Coronation chairs, where my old friend, after having heard that the stone underneath the most ancient of them, which was brought from Scotland, was called Jacob's Pillow, sat himself down in the chair; and looking like the figure of an old Gothic King, asked our Interpreter, What authority they had to say, that Jacob had ever been in Scotland? The fellow, instead of returning him an answer, told him, that he hoped his Honour would pay his forfeit. I could observe Sir Roger a little ruffled upon being thus trapped; but our guide not inflicting upon his demand, the Knight soon recovered his good-humour, and whispered in my ear, that if Will Wimble were with us, and saw those two chairs, it would go hard but he would get a tobacco-flopper out of one or 'other of them.

Sir Roger, in the next place, laid his hand upon Edward the third's sword, and leaning upon the pommel of it, gave us the whole history of the Black Prince; concluding, that in Sir Richard Baker's opinion, Edward the third was one of the greatest Princes that ever sat upon the English Throne.

We were then shewn Edward the Confessor's tomb; upon which Sir Roger acquainted us, that he was the first that touched for the Evil; and afterwards Henry the fourth's, upon which he shook his head, and told us, there was fine reading of the casualties of that reign.

Our Conductor then pointed to that monument where there is the figure of one of our English Kings without an head; and upon giving us to know, that the head, which was of beaten silver, had been stolen away several years since; some Whig, I'll warrant you, says Sir Roger; you ought to lock up your Kings better; they will carry off the body too, if you do not take care.

The glorious names of Henry the fifth and Queen Elizabeth gave the Knight great opportunities of shining, and of doing justice to Sir Richard Baker, who, as our Knight observed with some surprize, had great many Kings in him, whose monuments he had not seen in the Abbey.

For my own part, I could not but be pleased to see the Knight show such an honest notion for the glory of his country, and such a respectful gratitude to the memory of its princes.

I must not omit, that the benevolence of my good old friend, which flows out towards every one he converses with, made him very kind to our Interpreter, whom he looked upon as an extraordinary man; for which reason he shook him by the hand at parting, telling him, that he should be very glad to see him at his lodgings in Norfolk-buildings, and talk over these matters with him more at leisure.

Tuesday,
MY friend Sir Roger de Coverly, when we last met together at the club, told me, that he had a great mind to see the new Tragedy with me, advising me at the same time, that he had not been at a play these twenty years. The last I saw, said Sir Roger, was the Committee, which I should not have gone to neither, had not I been told before-hand that it was a good Church-of-England Comedy. He then proceeded to enquire of me who this Distressed Mother was; and upon hearing that she was Hettor's widow, he told me, that her husband was a brave man, and that when he was a school-boy he had read his life at the end of the Dictionary. My friend asked me, in the next place, if there would not be some danger in coming home late, in case the Mohocks should be abroad. I assure you, says he, I thought I had fallen into their hands last night; for I observed two or three lusty black men that followed me half way up Fleetstreet, and mended their pace behind me, in proportion as I put on to go away from them. You must know, continued the Knight with a smile, I fancied they had a mind to know me: for I remember an honest Gentleman in my neighbourhood, who was served such a trick in King Charles the Second's time; for which reason he has not ventured himself in town ever since. I might have shown them very good sport, had this been their design; for as I am an old Fox-hunter, I should have turned and dodged, and have played them a thousand tricks they had never seen in their lives before. Sir Roger added, that if these Gentlemen had any such intention, they did not succeed very well in it; for I threw them out, says he, at the end of Northstreet, where I doubled the corner, and got shelter in my lodgings before they could imagine what was become of me. However, says the Knight, if Captain Sentry will make one with us to-morrow night, and
and if you will both of you call upon me about four a-clock, that we may be at the house before it is full, I will have my own coach in readiness to attend you, for

The Captain, who did not fail to meet me there at the appointed hour, bid Sir Roger fear nothing, for that he had put on the same sword which he made use of at the battle of Steenikirk. Sir Roger's servants, and among the rest my old friend the Butler, had, I found, provided themselves with good oaken plants, to attend their master upon this occasion. When we had placed him in his coach, with my self at his left hand, the Captain before him, and his Butler at the head of his Footmen in the rear, we conveyed him in safety to the play-house; where, after having marched up the entry in good order, the Captain and I went in with him, and seated him betwixt us in the pit. As soon as the house was full, and the candles lighted, my old friend stood up and looked about him with that pleasure, which a mind seasoned with humanity naturally feels in itself, at the sight of a multitude of people who seem pleased with one another, and partake of the same common entertainment. I could not but fancy to myself, as the old man stood up in the middle of the pit, that he made a very proper center to a tragick audience. Upon the entering of Pyrrhus, the Knight told me, that he did not believe the King of France himself had a better figure. I was indeed very attentive to my old friend's remarks, because I looked upon them as a piece of natural criticism, and was well pleased to hear him at the conclusion of almost every Scene, telling me that he could not imagine how the Play would end. One while he appeared much concerned for Andromache, and a little while after as much for Hermione: and was extremely puzzled to think what would become of Pyrrhus.

When Sir Roger saw Andromache's obstinate refusal to her lover's importunities, he whispered me in the ear, that he was sure she would never have him; to which he added, with a more than ordinary vehemence, you cannot imagine, Sir, what it is to have to do with a widow. Upon Pyrrhus his threatening afterwards to leave her, the Knight shook his head, and muttered to himself, Ay, do if you can. This part dwelt so much upon my friend's imagination, that at the close of the third Act, as I was thinking of something else, he whispered in my ear, These widows, Sir, are the most perverse creatures in the world. But pray, says he, you that are a Critick, is this Play according to your Dramatic rules, as you call them? Should your people in Tragedy always talk to be understood? 'Why, there is not a single sentence in this Play that I do not know the meaning of.

The fourth Act very luckily begun before I had time to give the old Gentleman an answer: Well, says the Knight, sitting down with great satisfaction, I suppose we are now to see Hector's Ghost. He then renewed his attention, and, from time to time, fell a praising the widow. He made, indeed, a little mistake as to one of her pages, whom at his first entering, he took for Astyanax; but he quickly set himself right in that particular, though, at the same time, he owned he should have been very glad to have seen the little boy, who, says he, must needs be a very fine child by the account that is given of him. Upon Hermione's going off with a menace to Pyrrhus, the audience gave a loud clap; to which Sir Roger added, On my word, a notable young baggage!

As there was a very remarkable silence and stillness in the audience during the whole action, it was natural for them to take the opportunity of the intervals between the Acts, to express their opinion of the Players, and of their respective parts. Sir Roger hearing a cluster of them praise Orestes, struck in with them, and told them, that he thought his friend Pythades was a very sensible man; as they were afterwards applauding Pyrrhus, Sir Roger put in a second time, And let me tell you, says he, though he speaks but little, I like the old fellow in whiskers as well as any of them. Captain Sentry, seeing two or three wags who sat near us, lean with an attentive ear towards Sir Roger, and tearing left they should smoke the Knight, plucked him by the elbow, and whispered something in his ear, that lasted till the opening of the fifth Act. The Knight was wonderfully attentive to the account which Orestes gives of Pyrrhus his death, and at the conclusion of it, told me it was such a bloody piece of work, that he was glad it was not done upon the stage. Seeing afterwards Orestes in his raving fit, he grew more than ordinary fierce, and took occasion to moralize (in his way) upon an evil conscience, adding, that Orestes, in his madness, looked as if he saw something.

As we were the first that came into the house, so we were the last that went out of it; being resolved to have a clear passage for our old friend, whom we did not care to venture among the jostling of the crowd. Sir Roger went out fully satisfied with his entertainment, and we guarded him to his lodgings in the same manner that we brought him to the Playhouse; being highly pleased, for my own part, not only with the performance of the excellent piece which had been presented, but with the satisfaction which it had given to the good old man.

Thursday,
Will Honeycomb, who loves to shew upon occasion all the little learning he has picked up, told us yesterday at the club, that he thought there might be a great deal said for the transmigration of Souls, and that the eastern parts of the world believed in that doctrine to this day. Sir Paul Rycaut says he, gives us an account of several well-disposed Mahometans that purchase the freedom of any little bird they see confined to a cage, and think they merit as much by it, as we should do here by ransoming any of our countrymen from their captivity at Algiers. You may know, says Will, the reason is, because they consider every animal as a brother or a sister in disguise, and therefore think themselves obliged to extend their charity to them, though under such mean circumstances. They will tell you, says Will, that the Soul of a man, when he dies, immediately passes into the body of another man, or of some brute, which he resembled in his humour, or his fortune, when he was one of us.

As I was wondering what this profusion of learning would end in, Will told us that Jack Freelove, who was a fellow of Whim, made love to one of those Ladies who throw away all their fondness on parrots, monkeys, and lap-dogs. Upon going to pay her a visit one morning, he writes a very pretty epistle upon this hint. Jack says he, was conducted into the parlour, where he diverted himself for some time with her favourite monkey, which was chained in one of the windows; till at length observing a pen and ink lies by him, he wrote the following letter to his Mistriss, in the person of the monkey; and upon her not coming down so soon as he expected, left it in the window, and went about his business.
The Lady soon after coming into the parlour, and seeing her monkey look upon a paper with great earnestness, took it up, and to this day is in some doubt, says WILL, whether it was written by Jack or the monkey.

Madam,

"NOT having the gift of speech, I have a long time waited in vain for an opportunity of making my self known to you; and having at present the conveniences of pen, ink, and paper by me, I gladly take the occasion of giving you my history in writing, which I could not do by word of mouth. You must know, Madam, that about a thousand years ago I was an Indian Brachman, and verified in all those mysterious secrets which your European Philosopher, called Pythagoras, is said to have learned from our fraternity. I had so ingratiated my self by my great skill in the occult sciences with a Daemon whom I used to converse with, that he promised to grant me whatever I should ask of him. I desired that my soul might never pass into the body of a brute creature; but this he told me was not in his power to grant me. I then begged that into whatever creature I should chance to transmigrate, I might still retain my memory, and be conscious that I was the same person who lived in different animals. This he told me was within his power, and accordingly promised on the word of a Daemon that he would grant me what I desired. From that time forth I lived so very unblameably, that I was made President of a college of Brachmans, an office which I discharged with great integrity till the day of my death.

I was then shuffled into another human body, and acted my part so very well in it, that I became first Minister to a Prince who reigned upon the banks of the Ganges. I here lived in great honour for several years, but by degrees lost all the innocence of the Brachman, being obliged to rise and oppress the people to enrich my Sovereign; till at length I became so odious, that my Master, to recover his credit with his subjects, shot me through the heart with an arrow, as I was one day addressing my self to him at the head of his army.

Upon my next remove I found my self in the woods under the shape of a Jack-call, and soon lifted my self in the service of a Lion. I used to yelp near his den about midnight, which was his time of rouzing and seeking after his prey. He always followed me in the rear, and when I had run down a fat buck, a wild goat, or an hare, after he had feasted very very plentifully upon it himself, would now and then throw me a bone that was but half picked for my encouragement; but upon my being unsuccessful in two or three chases, he gave me such a confounded gripe in his anger, that I died of it.
In my next transmigration I was again set upon two legs, and became an Indian tax-gatherer; but having been guilty of great extravagances, and being married to an expensive jade of a wife, I ran so curiously in debt, that I durst not shew my head. I could no sooner step out of my house, but I was arrested by some body or other that lay in wait for me. As I ventured abroad one night in the dusk of the evening, I was taken up and hurrying into a dungeon, where I died a few months after.
My soul then entered into a flying-fish, and in that state led a most melancholy life for the space of six years. Several fishes of prey pursued me when I was in the water, and if I betook my self to my wings, it was ten to one but I had a flock of birds aiming at me. As I was one day flying amidst a fleet of English ships, I observed a huge sea-gull whetting his bill and hovering just over my head: Upon my diping into the water to avoid him, I fell into the mouth of a mondrous shark that swallowed me down in an instant.
I was some years afterwards, to my great surprize, an eminent ban-er in Lombard Street; and remembering how I had formerly suffered for want of money, became so very forlorn and avaricious, that the whole town cried shame of me. I was a miserable little old fellow to look upon, for I had in a manner starved my self, and was nothing but skin and bone when I died.
I was afterwards very much troubled and amazed to find my self dwindled into an emmet. I was heartily concerned to make so insignifificant a figure, and did not know but some time or other I might be reduced to a mite if I did not mend my manners. I therefore applied my self with great diligence to the offices that were allotted me, and was generally looked upon as the noblest ant in the whole molehill.
I was at last picked up, as I was groaning under a burden, by an unlucky cock-sparrow that lived in the neighbourhood, and had before made great depredations upon our commonwealth.
I then bettered my condition a little, and lived a whole summer in the shape of a Bee; but being tired with the painful and penurious life I had undergone in my two last transmigrations, I fell into the other extreme, and turned drone. As I one day headed a party to plunder

I i. 2

"an
"an hive, we were received so warmly by the swarm which defended it, that we were most of us left dead upon the spot.

I might tell you of many other trañas in which I went through: how I was a town-rake, and afterwards did penance in a bay gelding for ten years; as also how I was a Taylor, a Shrimp, and a Tom-tit. In the last of these my shapes I shot in the Christmas holidays by a young Jack-a-napes, who would needs try his new gun upon me.

But I shall pass over these and several other stages of life, to remind you of the young beau who made love to you about six years since. You may remember, Madam, how he masked, and danced, and sung, and played a thousand tricks to gain you; and how he was at last carried off by a cold that he had got under your window one night in a serenade. I was that unfortunate young fellow, whom you were then so cruel to. Not long after my shifting that unlucky body, I found myself upon a hill in Ethiopia, where I lived in my present grotesque shape, till I was caught by a servant of the English factory, and sent over into Great Britain: I need not inform you how I came into your hand. You see, Madam, this is not the first time that you have had me in a chain: I am, however, very happy in this my captivity, as you often bow to me the kiss and caresses which I would have given the world for, when I was a man. I hope this discovery of my person will not tend to my disadvantage, but that you will still continue your accustomed favours to

Your most devoted humble Servant, Pug.

P. S. "I would advise your little shock-dog to keep out of my way; for as I look upon him to be the most formidable of my rivals, I may chance one time or other to give him such a snap as he won't like."
I am very much pleased with a conolatory letter of Phalaris, to one who had left a son that was a young man of great merit. The thought with which he comforts the afflicted father, is, to the best of my memory, as follows: that he should consider death had set a kind of seal upon his son’s character, and placed him out of the reach of vice and infamy: that while he lived he was still within the possibility of falling away from virtue, and losing the fame of which he was possessed. Death only closes a man’s reputation, and determines it as good or bad.

This, among other motives, may be one reason why we are naturally averse to the launching out into a man’s praise till his head is laid in the dust. Whilst he is capable of changing, we may be forced to retract our opinions. He may forfeit the esteem we have conceived of him, and some time or other appear to us under a different light from what he does at present. In short, as the life of any man cannot be called happy or unhappy, so neither can it be pronounced vicious or virtuous, before the conclusion of it.

It was upon this consideration that Epaminondas, being asked whether Chabrias, Lycurgus, or he himself deserved most to be esteemed? You must first see us die, said he, before that question can be answered.

As there is not a more melancholy consideration to a good man than his being obnoxious to such a change, so there is nothing more glorious than to keep up an uniformity in his actions, and preserve the beauty of his character to the last.

The end of a man’s life is often compared to the winding up of a well-written Play, where the principal persons still act in character, whatever... the fate is which they undergo. There is scarce a great person in the Gridian or Roman history, whose death has not been remarked upon by some writer or other, and censured or applauded according to the Genius or principles of the person who has deicaanted on it. Moniteur de St. Evremont is very particular in setting forth the constancy and courage of Petronius Arbiter during his last moments, and thinks he discovers in them a greater firmness of mind and resolution than in the death of Senna, Caso, or Socrates. There is no question but this polite Author's affection for Petronius's merit, that he died in the same gaiety of temper in which he lived; but as his life was altogether loose and dissolute, the indifference which he shewed at the close of it is to be looked upon as a piece of natural carelessness and levity, rather than fortitude. The resolution of Socrates proceeded from very different motives, the conscientiousness of a well-spent life, and the prospect of a happy eternity. If the ingenious Author above-mentioned was so pleased with gaiety of humour in a dying man, he might have found a much nobler instance of it in our countryman Sir Thomas More.

This great and learned man was famous for enlivening his ordinary discourses with wit and pleasantry; and, as Erasmus tells him in an epitaph dedicatory, acted in all parts of life like a second Democritus.

He died upon a point of religion, and is respected as a Martyr by that side for which he suffered. That innocent mirth which had been so conspicuous in his life, did not forsake him to the last: he maintained the same cheerfulnes of heart upon the scaffold, which he used to shew at his table; and upon laying his head on the block, gave instances of that good-humour with which he had always entertained his friends in the most ordinary occurrences. His death was of a piece with his life. There was nothing in it new, forced or affected. He did not look upon the severing of his head from his body as a circumstance that ought to produce any change in the disposition of his mind; and as he died under a fixed and settled hope of immortality, he thought any unusual degree of sorrow and concern improper on such an occasion, as had nothing in it which could deject or terrify him.

There is no great danger of imitation from this example. Mens natural fears will be a sufficient guard against it. I shall only observe, that what was philosophy in this extraordinary man, would be frenzy in one who does not resemble him as well in the cheerfulness of his temper, as in the sanctity of his life and manners.
I shall conclude this paper with the instance of a person who seems to me to have shewn more intrepidity and greatness of soul in his dying moments, than what we meet with among any of the most celebrated Greeks and Romans. I meet with this instance in the history of the revolutions in Portugal, written by the Abbot de Vertot.

When Don Sebastian, King of Portugal, had invaded the territories of Mouy Mouic, Emperor of Morocco, in order to dethrone him, and set his Crown upon the head of his Nephew, Mouic was wearing away with a distemper which he himself knew was incurable. However, he prepared for the reception of so formidable an enemy. He was indeed so far spent with his sickness, that he did not expect to live out the whole day, when the last decisive battle was given; but knowing the fatal consequences that would happen to his children and people, in case he should die before he put an end to the war, he commanded his principal Officers that if he died during the engagement, they should conceal his death from the army, and that they should ride up to the Litter in which his corps was carried, under pretence of receiving orders from him as usual. Before battle begun he was carried through all the ranks of his army in an open Litter, as they stood drawn up in array, encouraging them to fight valiantly in defence of their religion and country. Finding afterwards the battle to go against him, though he was very near his last agones, he threw himself out of his litter, rallied his army, and led them on to the charge; which afterwards ended in a complete victory on the side of the Moors. He had no sooner brought his men to the engagement, but finding himself utterly spent, he was again replaced in his litter, where laying his finger on his mouth, to enjoyn secrecy to his Officers, who stood about him, he died a few moments after in that posture.

Thursday,
I have been very often tempted to write invectives upon those who have detracted from my works, or spoken in derogation of my person; but I look upon it as a particular happiness, that I have always hindered my resentments from proceeding to this extremity. I once had gone through half a satire, but found so many motions of humanity rising in me towards the persons whom I had severely treated, that I threw it into the fire without ever finishing it. I have been angry enough to make several little epigrams and lampoons; and after having admired them a day or two, have likewise committed them to the flames. These I look upon as so many sacrifices to humanity, and have received much greater satisfaction from the suppressing such performances, than I could have done from any reputation they might have procured me, or from any mortification they might have given my enemies, in case I had made them public. If a man has any talent in writing, it shews a good mind to forbear answering calumnies and reproaches in the same spirit of bitterness with which they are offered: But when a man has been at some pains in making suitable returns to an enemy, and has the instruments of revenge in his hands, to let drop his wrath, and stifle his resentments, seems to have something in it great and heroic. There is a particular merit in such a way of forgiving an enemy; and the more violent and unprovoked the offence has been, the greater still is the merit of him who thus forgives it.

I never met with a consideration that is more finely spun, and what has better pleased me, than one in Epistulae, which places an enemy in a new light, and gives us a view of him altogether different from that in which we are used to regard him. The sentence is as follows: Does a man reproach thee for being proud or ill-natured, envious or conceited, ignorant or detracting? consider with thyself whether his reproaches are true; if they are not, consider that thou art not the person whom he reproaches.
proaches, but that he reviles an imaginary Being, and perhaps loves what thou really art, though he hates what thou appeared to be. If his reproaches are true, if thou art the envious ill-natured man he takes thee for, give thy self another turn, become mild, affable and obliging, and his reproaches of thee naturally cease: his reproaches may indeed continue, but thou art no longer the person whom he reproaches.

I often apply this rule to myself; and when I hear of a satirical speech or writing that is aimed at me, I examine my own heart, whether I deserve it or not. If I bring in a verdict against myself, I endeavour to rectify my conduct for the future in those particulars which have drawn the censure upon me; but if the whole invective be grounded upon a falsehood, I trouble my self no further about it, and look upon my name at the head of it to signify no more than one of those fictitious names made use of by an Author to introduce an imaginary character. Why should a man be sensible of the sting of a reproach, who is a stranger to the guilt that is implied in it? or subject himself to the penalty, when he knows he has never committed the crime? This is a piece of fortitude, which every one owes to his own innocence, and without which it is impossible for a man of any merit or figure, to live at peace with himself in a country that abounds with wit and liberty.

The famous Monfieur Balzac, in a Letter to the Chancellor of France, who had prevented the publication of a book against him, has the following words, which are a lively picture of the greatness of mind so visible in the works of that Author.

If it was a new thing, it may be I should not be displeased with the suppression of the first libel that should abuse me; but since there are enough of them to make a small library, I am secretly pleased to see the number increased, and take delight in raising a heap of stones that Envy has cast at me without doing me any harm.

The Author here alludes to those monuments of the eastern nations, which were mountains of stones raised upon the dead body by travellers, that used to cast every one his stone upon it as they passed by. It is certain that no monument is so glorious as one which is thus raised by the hands of Envy. For my part, I admire an Author for such a temper of mind as enables him to bear an undeserved reproach without resentment, more than for all the wit of any the finest satirical reply.

Thus far I thought necessary to explain my self in relation to those who have animadverted on this paper, and to shew the reasons why I have not thought fit to return them any formal answer. I must further add, that the work would have been of very little use to the public, had it been been filled with personal reflections and debates; for which reason I have never once turned out of my way to observe those little cavils which have been made against it by Envy or Ignorance. The common cry of scribers, who have no other way of being taken notice of but by attacking what has gained some reputation in the world, would have furnished me with business enough, had they found me disposed to enter the Lists with them.

I shall conclude with the Fable of Boccacin’s traveller, who was so pestered with the noise of grasshoppers in his ears, that he alighted from his horse in great wrath to kill them all. This, says the Author, was troubling himself to no manner of purpose: had he pursued his journey without taking notice of them, the troublesome insects would have died of themselves in a very few weeks, and he would have suffered nothing from them.

N° 361. Thursday, April 24.

Tartarea am intendit vocem, qua proimos omnis Contremuit domus——— Virg.

I have lately received the following Letter from a country Gentleman.

Mr. Spectator,

THE night before I left London I went to see a Play, called, The “Humorous Lieutenant.” Upon the rising of the curtain I was very much surprized with the great Confort of Cat-calls which was exhibited that evening, and began to think with myself that I had made a mistake, and gone to a Musick-meeting instead of the Playhouse. It appeared indeed a little odd to me to see so many persons of quality of both sexes assembled together at a kind of Caterwauling; for I cannot look upon that performance to have been anything better, whatever the Musicians themselves might think of it. As I had no acquaintance in the house to ask questions of, and was forced to go out out of town early the next morning, I could not learn the secret of this matter. What I would therefore desire of you, is, to give some account of this strange instrument, which I found the company called a Cat-call; and particularly to let me know whether it be a piece of music lately come from Italy. For my own part, to be free with you, I would rather hear an English Fiddle; though I durst not shew my dislike whilst I was in the Play-house, it being my chance to sit the very next man to one of the Performers.

I am, SIR, Your most affectionate Friend and Servant.

John Shallow, Esq.

In compliance with Squire Shallow's request, I design this paper as a dissertation upon the Cat-call. In order to make myself a master of the subject, I purchased one the beginning of last week, though not without great difficulty, being informed at two or three Toy-shops that the Players had lately bought them all up. I have since consulted many learned Antiquaries in relation to its original, and find them very much divided among themselves upon that particular. A Fellow of the Royal Society, who is my good friend, and a great proficient in the mathematical part of music, concludes from the simplicity of its make, and the uniformity of it found, that the Cat-call is older than any of the inventions of Jubal. He observes very well, that musical instruments took their first rise from the notes of birds, and other melodious animals; and what, says he, was more natural than for the first Ages of mankind to imitate the voice of a Cat that lived under the same roof with them? he added, that the Cat had contributed more to harmony than any other animal; as we are not only beholden to her for this wind-instrument, but for our singing-music in general.

Another Virtuoso of my acquaintance will not allow the Cat-call to be older than Thespis, and is apt to think it appeared in the world soon after the ancient Comedy; for which reason, it has still a place in our Dramic entertainments: nor must I here omit, what a very curious Gentleman, who is lately returned from his travels, has more than once assured me, namely, that there was lately dug up at Rome the Statue of a Mo-mus, who holds an instrument in his right-hand very much resembling our modern Cat-call.

There are others who ascribe this invention to Orpheus, and look upon the Cat-call to be one of those instruments which that famous Mucian made

made use of to draw the beasts about him. It is certain, that the roaring of a cat does not call together a greater audience of that species, than this instrument, if dexterously played upon in proper time and place.

But notwithstanding these various and learned conjectures, I cannot forbear thinking that the Cat-call is originally a piece of English mufick. Its resemblance to the voice of some of our British songsters, as well as the use of it, which is peculiar to our nation, confirms me in this opinion. It has at least received great improvements among us, whether we consider the instrument itself, or those several quavers and graces which are thrown into the playing of it. Every one might be sensible of this, who heard that remarkable over-grown Cat-call which was placed in the center of the pit, and presided over all the rest at the celebrated performance lately exhibited in Drury-lane.

Having said thus much concerning the original of the Cat-call, we are in the next place to consider the use of it. The Cat-call excites it itself to most advantage in the British theatre: It very much improves the sound of Non-fense, and often goes along with the voice of the actor who pronounces it, as the Violin or Harpsichord accompanies the Italian Recitative.

It has often supplied the place of the ancient Chorus, in the words of Mr. . In short, a bad Poet has as great an antipathy to a Cat-call, as many people have to a real Cat.

Mr. Collier, in his ingenious Essay upon Mufick, has the following passage:

I believe it is possible to invent an instrument that shall have a quite contrary effect to those martial ones now in use: an instrument that shall sink the spirits, and shake the nerves, and curdle the blood, and inspire despair, and cowardice and confirmation, at a surprising rate. It is probable the roaring of a Lion, the warbling of Cats and Scrich-owls, together with a mixture of the bowing of Dogs, judiciously imitated and compounded, might go a great way in this invention. Whether such Anti-mufick as this might not be of service in a camp, I shall leave to the military men to consider.

What this learned Gentleman supposes in speculation, I have known actually verified in practice. The Cat-call has struck a damp into Generals, and frightened Heroes off the stage. At the first sound of it I have seen a crowned head tremble, and a Prince fall into fits. The humours Lieutenant himself could not stand it; nay, I am told that even Almazar looked like a mouse, and trembled at the voice of this terrifying instrument.
As it is of a Dramatic nature, and peculiarly appropriated to the stage, I can by no means approve the thought of that angry lover, who, after an unsuccessful pursuit of some years, took leave of his Mistres in a serenade of Cat-calls.

I must conclude this paper with the account I have lately received of an ingenious artist, who has long studied this instrument, and is very well versed in all the rules of the Drama. He teaches to play on it by book, and to express by it the whole art of criticism. He has his bafe and his treble Cat-call; the former for Tragedy, the latter for Comedy; only in Tragi-comedies they may both play together in comfort. He has a particular squeak to denote the violation of each of the unities, and has different founds to shew whether he aims at the poet or the player. In short, he teaches the Smut-note, the Fuslian-note, the Stupid-note, and has composed a kind of air that may serve as an Act-tune to an incorrigible play, and which takes in the whole compass of the Cat-call.

---Periture parcite charta... Juv.

I have often pleased myself with considering the two kinds of benefits which accrue to the publick from these my Speculations, and which, were I to speak after the manner of Logicians, I would distinguish into the Material and the Format. By the latter I understand those advantages which my Readers receive, as their minds are either improved or delighted by these my daily labours; but having already several times declin'd on my endeavours in this light, I shall at present wholly confine myself to the consideration of the former. By the word Material I mean those benefits which arise to the publick from these my Speculations, as they confine a considerable quantity of our paper manufacture, employ our Artificers in printing, and find business for great numbers of indigent perfons.

Our paper-manufacture takes into it several mean materials which could be put to no other use, and affords work for several hands in the collecting. of:
of them, which are incapable of any other employment. Those poor retailers, whom we see so busy in every street, deliver in their respective gleanings to the Merchant. The Merchant carries them in loads to the paper-mill, where they pass through a fresh set of hands, and give life to another trade. Those who have mills on their estates, by this means considerably raise their rents, and the whole nation is in a great measure supplied with a manufacture, for which formerly she was obliged to her neighbours.

The materials are no sooner wrought into paper, but they are distributed among the presses, where they again set innumerable artists at work, and furnish buffets to another mystery. From hence, accordingly as they are stained with news or politics, they fly through the town in Post-men, Post-boys, Daily-Courants, Reviewers, Medleys, and Examiners. Men, women, and children contend who shall be the first bearers of them, and get their daily sustenance by spreading them. In short, when I trace in my mind a bundle of rags to a quire of Spectators, I find so many hands employed in every step they take through their whole progress, that while I am writing a Spectator, I fancy myself providing bread for a multitude.

If I do not take care to obviate some of my witty Readers, they will be apt to tell me, that my paper, after it is thus printed and published, is still beneficial to the publick on several occasions. I must confess I have lighted my pipe with my own works for this twelve-month past: my Landlady often lends up her little daughter to defire some of my old Spectators, and has frequently told me, that the paper they are printed on is the best in the world to wrap spic in. They likewise make a good foundation for a Mutton-pye, as I have more than once experienced, and were very much fought for last Christmas by the whole neighbourhood.

It is pleasant enough to consider the changes that a linen fragment undergoes, by passing through the several hands above-mentioned. The finest pieces of Holland, when torn to tatters, assume a new whiteness more beautiful than their first, and often return in the shape of letters to their native country. A Ladies shift may be metamorphosed into Billet-doux, and come into her possession a second time. A Beau may turn his cravat after it is worn out, with greater pleasure and advantage than ever he did in a glass. In a word, a piece of cloth, after having officiated for some years as a towel or a napkin, may by this means be raised from a dunghill, and become the most valuable piece of furniture in a Prince's cabinet.

The
The politest nations of Europe have endeavoured to vie with one another for the reputation of the finest printing: absolute Governments, as well as Republicks, have encouraged an art which seems to be the noblest and most beneficial that was ever invented among the sons of men. The present King of France, in his pursuits after Glory, has particularly distinguished himself by the promoting of this useful art, inasmuch that several books have been printed in the Louvre at his own expense, upon which he sets so great a value, that he considers them as the noblest presents he can make to foreign Princes and Ambassadors. If we look into the Commonwealths of Holland and Venice, we shall find that in this particular they have made themselves the envy of the greatest Monarchies. Elsevir and Aldus are more frequently mentioned than any Pensioner of the one or Doge of the other.

The several presses which are now in England, and the great encouragement which has been given to learning for some years past, has made our own nation as glorious upon this account, as for its late triumphs and conquests. The new Edition which is given us of Cæsar's Commentaries, has already been taken notice of in foreign Gazetteers, and is a work that does honour to the English Press. It is no wonder that an Edition should be very correct, which has passed through the hands of one of the most accurate, learned, and judicious writers this age has produced. The Beauty of the paper, of the Character, and of the several Cuts with which this noble work is illustrated, makes it the finest book that I have ever seen; and is a true instance of the English Genius, which, though it does not come the first into any art, generally carries it to greater heights than any other country in the world. I am particularly glad that this Author comes from a British printing-house in so great a magnificence, as he is the first who has given us any tolerable account of our country.

My illiterate readers, if any such there are, will be surprized to hear me talk of Learning as the glory of a nation, and of Printing as an art that gains a reputation to a people among whom it flourishes. When mens thoughts are taken up with avarice and ambition, they cannot look upon any thing as great or valuable, which does not bring with it an extraordinary power or interest to the person who is concerned in it. But as I shall never sink this paper so far as to engage with Goths and Vandals, I shall only regard such kind of reasoners with that pity which is due to so deplorable a degree of stupidity and ignorance.

Tuesday,
Shall communicate to my Reader the following letter for the entertainment of this day.

SIR,

"YOU know very well that our nation is more famous for that sort of men who are called Whims and Humorists, than any other country in the world; for which reason it is observed that our English Comedy excels that of all other nations in the novelty and variety of its characters.

"Among these innumerable sets of Whims which our country produces, there are none whom I have regarded with more curiosity than those who have invented any particular kind of diversion for the entertainment of themselves or their friends. My letter shall single out those who take delight in forting a company that has something of burlesque and ridicule in its appearance. I shall make my self understood by the following example. One of the wits of the last age, who was a man of a good estate, thought he never laid out his money better than in a jest. As he was one year at the Bath, observing that in the greatest company of fine people, there were several among them with long chins, a part of the village by which he himself was very much distinguished, he invited to dinner half a score of these remarkable persons who had their mouths in the middle of their faces. They had no sooner placed themselves about the table, but they began to stare upon one another, not being able to imagine what had brought them together. Our English proverb says,

'Tis merry in the hall,
When beards wag all.
It proved so in an assembly I am now speaking of, who seeing so many peaks of faces agitated with eating, drinking, and discoursing, and observing all the chins that were present meeting together very often over the center of the table, every one grew sensible of the jest, and came into it with so much good-humour, that they lived in strict friendship and alliance from that day forward.

"The same Gentleman some time after packed together a set of Ogers, as he called them, consisting of such as had an unlucky call in their eyes. His diversion on this occasion was to see the crofs bows, mistaken signs, and wrong conundrums that passed amidit so many broken and refracted rays of light.

"The third feast which this merry Gentleman exhibited was to the Stammerers, whom he got together in a sufficient body to fill his table. He had ordered one of his servants, who was placed behind a skreen, to write down their table-talk, which was very easy to be done without the help of short-hand. It appears by the notes which were taken, that though their conversation never fell, there were not above twenty words spoken during the first course; that upon serving up the second, one of the company was a quarter of an hour in telling them, that the ducklings and sparrow-grafs was very good; and that another took up the same time in declaring himself of the same opinion. This jest did not, however, go off so well as the former; for one of the guests being a brave man, and fuller of resentment than he knew how to express, went out of the room, and sent the facetious inviter a challenge in writing, which though it was afterwards dropped by the interposition of friends, put a stop to these ludicrous entertainments.

"Now, Sir, I dare say you will agree with me, that as there is no moral in these jests, they ought to be discouraged, and looked upon rather as pieces of unicity than wit. However, as it is natural for one man to receive upon the thought of another, and impossible for any single person, how great ever his parts may be, to invent an art, and bring it to its utmost perfection; I shall here give you an account of an honest Gentleman of my acquaintance, who upon hearing the character of the Wit above-mentioned, has himself assumed it, and endeavoured to convert it to the benefit of mankind. He invited half a dozen of his friends one day to dinner, who were each of them famous for inferring several redundant phrases in their discourse, as d'y hear me, d'y see, that is, and so Sir. Each of the guests making frequent use of his particular elegance, appeared so ridiculous to his neighbour, that he could not but reflect upon himself as appearing equally ridiculous to the rest of the company: by this means, before they had sat long together, every one talking with the greatest circumspection, and carefully avoiding his favourite expletive, the conversation was cleared of its redundancies, and had a greater quantity of sense, though less of sound in it.

The same well-meaning Gentleman took occasion, at another time, to bring together such of his friends as were addicted to a foolish habitual custom of swearing. In order to shew them the absurdity of the practice, he had recourse to the invention above-mentioned, having placed an Ammonenst in a private part of the room. After the second bottle, when men open their minds without reserve, my honest friend began to take notice of many honorous but unnecessary words that had passed in his house since their sitting down at table, and how much good conversation they had lost by giving way to such superfluous phrases. What a tax, says he, would they have raised for the poor, had we put the laws in execution upon one another? Every one of them took this gentle reproof in good part: upon which he told them, that knowing their conversation would have no seerers in it, he had ordered it to be taken down in writing, and for the humour-fake would read it to them if they pleased. There were ten sheets of it, which might have been reduced to two, had there not been those abominable interpolations I have before-mentioned. Upon the reading of it in cold blood, it looked rather like a conference of fiends than of men. In short, every one trembled at himself upon hearing calmly what he had pronounced amidst the heat and inadvertency of discourse.

I shall only mention another occasion wherein he made use of the same invention to cure a different kind of men, who are the pets of all polite conversation, and murder Time as much as either of the two former, though they do it more innocently; I mean that dull generation of Story-tellers. My friend got together about half a dozen of his acquaintance, who were infected with this strange malady. The first day one of them sitting down, entered upon the siege of Namur, which lasted till four a clock, their time of parting. The second day a North-Briton took possession of the discourse, which it was impossible to get out of his hands so long as the company stayed together. The third day was engrossed after the same manner by a story of the same length. They at last began to reflect upon this barbarous way of treating one another, and by this means waken’d out of that lethargy with which each of them had been seized for several years.

As
"As you have somewhere declared, that extraordinary and uncommon characters of mankind are the game which you delight in, and as I look upon you to be the greatest sportsman, or, if you please, the Nimrod among this species of writers, I thought this discovery would not be unacceptable to you.

I am, SIR, &c.

Quid quisque vitae, nonquam homini fauis
Cautum est in horas——

Hor.

Love was the mother of Poetry, and still produces, among the most ignorant and barbarous, a thousand imaginary difficulties and poetical complaints. It makes a footman talk like Oroonotos, and converts a brutal rustick into a gentle swain. The most ordinary Plebian or Mechanic in love, bleeds and pines away with a certain elegance and tenderness of sentiments which this passion naturally inspires.

These inward languishings of a mind infected with this softness, have given birth to a phrase which is made use of by all the melting tribe, from the highest to the lowest, I mean that of dying for Love.

Romances, which owe their very Being to this passion, are full of these metaphorical deaths. Heroes and Heroines, Knights, Squires, and Damfels, are all of them in a dying condition. There is the same kind of mortality in our modern Tragedies, where every one gasps, faints, bleeds and dies. Many of the Poets, to describe the execution which is done by this passion, represent the fair sex as Basticks that destroy with their eyes; but I think Mr. Cowley has with greater judiciousness of thought compared a beautiful woman to a Porcupine, that sends an arrow from every part.

I have often thought, that there is no way so effectual for the cure of this general infirmity, as a man's reflecting upon the motives that produce it. When the passion proceeds from the tenet of any virtue or perfection in the persons beloved, I would by no means discourage it; but if a man considers that all his heavy complaints of wounds and deaths rise from some little affectations of coquetry, which are improved into charms by his own fond imagination, the very laying before himself the cause of his distemper, may be sufficient to effect the cure of it.

It is in this view that I have looked over the several bundles of Letters which I have received from dying people, and composed out of them the following bill of mortality, which I shall lay before my Reader without any further preface, as hoping that it may be useful to him in discovering those several places where there is most danger, and those fatal arts which are made use of to destroy the heedless and unwary.

Lyfander, slain at a Puppet-show on the third of September.
Thyra, shot from a casement in Pickadilly.
T. S. wounded by Zelinda's scarlet stockling, as she was stepping out of a coach.
Will. Simple, smitten at the Opera by the glance of an eye that was aimed at one who stood by him.
Tho. Vainlov lost his life at a Ball.
Tim. Tattle, killed by the tap of a fan on his left shoulder by Coquetilla, as he was talking carelessly with her in a bow-window.
Sir Simon Softly, murdered at the Play-house in Drury-Lane by a frown.
Philander, mortally wounded by Clora, as she was adjusting her Tucker.
Ralph Gapeby, Esq; hit by a random shot at the Ring.
F. R. caught his death upon the water, April the 31st.
W. W. killed by an unknown hand, that was playing with the glove off upon the side of the front-box in Drury-Lane.
Sir Christopher Crazzy, Bar. hurt by the brunt of a whalebone petticoat.
Sylvius, shot through the sticks of a fan at St. James's church.
Damon, struck through the heart by a diamond necklace.
Thomas Tastys, Francis Goosequill, William Meanswell, Edward Cal-
low, Esqs; standing in a row, fell all four at the same time, by an ogle of the Widow Trapland.
Tom Rattle, chanceing to tread upon a Lady's tail as he came out of the Play-house, she turned full upon him, and laid him dead upon the spot.
Dick Tastewell, slain from the Queen's box in the third act of the Trip to the Jubilee.

Samuel
Samuel Feltham Haberdasher wounded in his walk to Islington by Mrs. Susannah Crossley as she was clambering over a stile.

R. F. W. S. J. M. P. &c. put to death in the last birth-day massacre.

Roger Blizzard cut off in the twenty first year of his age by a white-wash.

Musidorus, slain by an arrow that blew out of a dimple in Belinda's left cheek.

Ned Courtney presenting Flavia with her glove (which she had dropped on purpose) she received it, and took away his life with a curtly.

John Goselin having received a flight hurt from a pair of blue eyes, as he was making his escape was dispatched by a smile.

Strephon, killed by Clarinda as she looked down into the pit.

Charles Careless, shot by a girl of fifteen, who unexpectedly popped her head upon him out of a coach.

Joseph Wither, aged three score and three, sent to his long home by Elizabeth Fettiwell, spinster.

Jack Freeland, murdered by Melissa in her hair.

William Wiseaker, Gent. drowned in a flood of tears by Moll Common.

John Pleadsall, Esq. of the Middle Temple, barrister at law, assassinated in his chambers the sixth instant by Kitty Sly, who pretended to come to him for his advice.

Æquam memento rebus in arduis
Servare mentem, non secus ac bonis
Ab infoleni temperatam Levitas, moriture Delis.

Hor:

I have always preferred Cheerfulness to Mirth. The latter, I consider as an act, the former as an habit of the mind. Mirth is short and transient, Cheerfulness fixed and permanent. Those are often raised railed into the greatest transports of mirth, who are subject to the greatest depressions of melancholy: on the contrary, cheerfulness, though it does not give the mind such an exquisite gladness, prevents us from falling into any depths of sorrow. Mirth is like a flash of lightning, that breaks through a gloom of clouds, and glitters for a moment; cheerfulness keeps up a kind of day-light in the mind, and fills it with a steady and perpetual serenity.

Men of austere principles look upon mirth as too wanton and dissolute for a state of probation, and as filled with a certain triumph and insolence of heart, that is inconsistent with a life which is every moment obnoxious to the greatest dangers. Writers of this complexion have observed, that the sacred person who was the great pattern of perfection was never seen to laugh.

Cheerfulness of mind is not liable to any of these exceptions; it is of a serious and composed nature, it does not throw the mind into a condition improper for the present state of humanity; and is very conspicuous in the characters of those who are looked upon as the greatest philosophers among the heathens, as well as among those who have been devotedly esteemed as Saints and holy men among Christians.

If we consider cheerfulness in three lights, with regard to our selves, to those we converse with, and to the great Author of our Being; it will not a little recommend it self on each of these accounts. The man who is possessed of this excellent frame of mind, is not only calm in his thoughts, but a perfect master of all the powers and faculties of his soul: his imagination is always clear, and his judgment undisturbed: his temper is even and unruffled, whether in action or in solitude. He comes with a relish to all those goods which nature has provided for him, tastes all the pleasures of the creation which are poured about him, and does not feel the full weight of those accidental evils which may befall him.

If we consider him in relation to the persons whom he converses with, it naturally produces love and good-will towards him. A cheerful mind is not only disposed to be affable and obliging, but railes the same good humour in those who come within its influence. A man finds himself pleased, he does not know why, with the cheerfulness of his companion: it is like a sudden sun-shine that awakens a secret delight in the mind, without her attending to it. The heart rejoices of its own accord, and naturally flows out into friendship and benevolence towards the person who has so kindly an effect upon it.

When
When I consider this cheerful state of mind in its third relation, I cannot but look upon it as a constant habitual gratitude to the great Author of nature. An inward cheerfulness is an implicit praise and thanksgiving to Providence under all its dispensations. It is a kind of acquiescence in the state wherein we are placed, and a secret approbation of the Divine Will in his conduct towards man.

There are but two things which, in my opinion, can reasonably deprive us of this cheerfulness of heart. The first of these is the sense of guilt. A man who lives in a state of vice and impenitence, can have no title to that evenness and tranquillity of mind which is the health of the soul, and the natural effect of virtue and innocence. Cheerfulness in an ill man deserves a harder name than language can furnish us with, and is many degrees beyond what we commonly call folly or madness.

Atheism, by which I mean a disbelief of a supreme Being, and consequently of a future State, under whatsoever titles it shelters itself, may likewise very reasonably deprive a man of this cheerfulness of temper. There is something so particularly gloomy and offensive to human nature in the prospect of Non-existence; that I cannot but wonder, with many excellent writers, how it is possible for a man to out-live the expectation of it. For my part, I think the being of a God is so little to be doubted, that it is almost the only truth we are sure of; and such a truth as we meet with in every object, in every occurrence, and in every thought. If we look into the characters of this tribe of Infidels, we generally find they are made up of pride, spleen, and cavel: It is indeed no wonder, that men, who are uneasy to themselves, should be so to the rest of the world; and how is it possible for a man to be otherwise than uneasy in himself, who is in danger every moment of losing his entire existence, and dropping into nothing?

The vicious man and Atheist have therefore no pretence to cheerfulness, and would act very unreasonably, should they endeavours after it. It is impossible for any one to live in good humour, and enjoy his present existence, who is apprehensive either of torment or of annihilation; of being miserable, or of not being at all.

After having mentioned these two great principles, which are destructive of cheerfulness in their own nature, as well as in right reason, I cannot think of any other that ought to banish this happy temper from a virtuous mind. Pain and sickness, shame and reproach, poverty and old age, may death itself, considering the shortness of their duration, and the advantage we may reap from them, do not deserve the name of evils. A good good mind may bear up under them with fortitude, with indolence, and with cheerfulness of heart. The toiling of a tempest does not discomfort him, which he is sure will bring him to a joyful harbour.

A man, who uses his bell endeavours to live according to the dictates of virtue and right reason, has two perpetual sources of cheerfulness; in the consideration of his own nature, and of that Being on whom he has a dependance. If he looks into himself, he cannot but rejoice in that existence, which is so lately bestowed upon him, and which, after millions of ages, will be still new, and still in its beginning. How many self-congratulations naturally arise in the mind, when it reflects on its entrance into Eternity, when it takes a view of those invariable faculties, which in a few years, and even at its first setting out, have made fo considerable a progress, and which will be still receiving an increase of perfection, and consequently an increase of happiness? The consciousness of such a Being spreads a perpetual diffusion of joy through the Soul of a virtuous man, and makes him look upon himself every moment as more happy than he knows how to conceive.

The second source of cheerfulness to a good mind, is its consideration of that Being on whom we have our dependance, in whom, though we behold him as yet but in the first faint discoveries of his perfections, we see every thing that we can imagine as great, glorious, or amiable. We find our selves everywhere upheld by his goodnes, and surrounded with an immensity of love and mercy. In short, we depend upon a Being, whose power qualifies him to make us happy by an infinity of means, whose goodnes and truth engage him to make those happy who desire it of him, and whose unchangeableness will secure us in this happiness to all eternity.

Such considerations, which every one should perpetually cherish in his thoughts, will banish from us all that secret heaviness of heart which unthinking men are subject to when they lie under no real affliction, all that anguish which we may feel from an evil that actually oppresses us, to which I may likewise add those little cracklings of mirth and folly that are apter to betray virtue than support it; and establish in us such an even and cheerful temper, as makes us pleasing to our selves, to those with whom we converse, and to him whom we were made to please.

Tuesday,
AS I was sitting in my chamber, and thinking on a subject for my next Spectator, I heard two or three irregular bounces at my Landlady's door, and upon the opening of it, a loud cheerful voice enquiring whether the Philosopher was at home. The child who went to the door answered very innocently, that he did not lodge there. I immediately recollected that it was my good friend Sir Roger's voice; and that I had promised to go with him on the water to Spring-garden, in case it proved a good evening. The Knight put me in mind of my promise from the stair-case, but told me that if I was speculating, he would stay below till I had done. Upon my coming down, I found all the children of the family got about my old friend, and my Landlady herself, who is a notable prating gossip, engaged in a conference with him; being mightily pleased with his boasting her little boy upon the head, and bidding him be a good child, and mind his book.

We were no sooner come to the Temple stairs, but we were surrounded with a crowd of water-men, offering their respective services. Sir Roger, after having looked about him very attentively, spied one with a wooden-leg, and immediately gave him orders to get his boat ready. As we were walking towards it, you must know, says Sir Roger, I never make use of any body to row me, that has not either lost a leg or an arm. I would rather have a few strokes of his oar, than employ an honest man that has been wounded in the Queen's service. If I was a Lord or a Bishop, and kept a barge, I would not put a fellow in my livery that had not a wooden leg.

My old friend, after having seated himself, and trimmed the boat with his coachman, who, being a very sober man, always serves for Ballast on these occasions, we made the best of our way for Fox-hall. Sir Roger obliged the Waterman to give us the history of his right leg, and hearing that he had left it at La Hogue, with many particulars which vol III.

palled in that glorious action, the Knight in the triumph of his heart made several reflections on the greatness of the British nation; as, that one Englishman could beat three Frenchmen; that we could never be in danger of popery so long as we took care of our fleet; that the Thames was the noblest river in Europe; that London-bridge was a greater piece of work than any of the seven wonders of the world; with many other honest prejudices which naturally cleave to the heart of a true Englishman.

After some short pause, the old Knight turning about his head twice or thrice, to take a survey of this great Metropolis, bid me observe how thick the city was fet with churches, and that there was scarce a single steeple on this side Temple-bar. A most heathenish sight! says Sir Roger: There is no religion at this end of the town. The fifty new churches will very much mend the prospect; but church-work is slow, church-work is slow!

I do not remember I have any where mentioned in Sir Roger's character, his custom of saluting every body that passes by him with a good-morrow or a good-night. This the old man does out of the overflowings of humanity, though at the same time it renders him so popular among all his country neighbours, that it is thought to have gone a good way in making him once or twice Knight of the shire. He cannot forbear this exercize of benevolence even in town, when he meets with any one in his morning or evening walk. It broke from him to several boats that passed by us upon the water; but to the Knight's great surprize, as he gave the good-night to two or three young fellows a little before our landing, one of them, instead of returning the civility, asked us what queer old Putt we had in the boat, and whether he was not ashamed to go a wenching at his years; with a great deal of the like Thames-ribaldry. Sir Roger seemed a little shocked at first, but at length assuming a face of magistracy, told us, That if he were a Middlesex Justice, he would make such vagrants know that her Majesty's subjects were no more to be abused by water than by land.

We were now arrived at Spring-garden, which is exquisitely pleasant at this time of year. When I considered the fragrancy of the walks and bowers, with the choirs of birds that sung upon the trees, and the loffe tribe of people that walked under their shades, I could but look upon the place as a kind of Mahometan paradise. Sir Roger told me it put him in mind of a little coplise by his house in the country, which his Chaplain used to call an Aviary of Nightingales. You must understand, says the Knight, there is nothing in the world that pleases a man in love so much as your Nightingale. Ah, Mr. Spectator! the many moon-light nights that I have walked by my self, and thought on the widow by the mufick of the Nightingale! He here fetched a deep sigh, and was faling into a fit of mufing, when a mask, who came behind him, gave him a gentle tap upon the shoulder, and asked him if he would drink a bottle of Mead with her? But the Knight being startled at fo unexpected a familiarity, and displeased to be interrupted in his thoughts of the widow, told her, She was a wanton baggage, and bid her go about her buisnifs. We concluded our walk with a glafs of Burton-ale, and a flice of Hungbeef. When we had done eating our felves, the Knight called a Waier to him, and bid him carry the remainder to a Waterman that had but one leg. I perceived the fellow flared upon him at the oddnefs of the mefage, and was going to be faucy; upon which I ratified the Knight's commands with a peremptory look.

As we were going out of the garden, my old friend thinking himself obliged, as a member of the Quorum, to animadvert upon the morals of the place, told the Miftrefs of the house, who fat at the bar, That he should be a better cuftomer to her garden, if there were more Nightingales and fewer Strumpets.

Quid purum tranquillit——

Hor.

In my laft Saturday's paper I fpoke of Cheerfulnes as it is a Moral habis of the mind, and accordingly mentioned fuch moral motives as are apt to cherish and keep alive this happy temper in the Soul of man:
I fhall now consider Cheerfulnes in its natural fate, and reflect on thofe motives to it, which are indifferent either as to virtue or vice.

Cheerfulnes is, in the firft place, the beft promoter of health. Repinings, and fecret murmurs of heart, give imperceptible frokes to thofe delicate fibres of which the vital parts are composed, and wear out the machine infinitely; not to mention thofe violent ferments which they fir up in the blood, and thofe irregular disturbed motions which they raife in the animal spirits. I scarce remember, in my own observation, to have met with any old men, or with such, who (to use our English phrase) wear well, that had not at least a certain indolence in their humour, if not a more than ordinary gaiety and cheerfulness of heart. The truth of it is, health and cheerfulness mutually beget each other; with this difference, that we seldom meet with a great degree of health which is not attended with a certain cheerfulness, but very often see cheerfulness where there is no great degree of health.

Cheerfulness bears the same friendly regard to the mind as to the body: it banishes all anxious care and discontent, soothes and composes the passions, and keeps the soul in a perpetual calm. But having already touched on this last consideration, I shall here take notice, that the world, in which we are placed, is filled with innumerable objects that are proper to raise and keep alive this happy temper of mind.

If we consider the world in its subserviency to man, one would think it was made for our use; but if we consider it in its natural beauty and harmony, one would be apt to conclude it was made for our pleasure. The Sun, which is as the great soul of the universe, and produces all the necessaries of life, has a particular influence in cheering the mind of man, and making the heart glad.

Those several living creatures which are made for our service or subsistence, at the same time either fill the woods with their music, furnish us with game, or raise pleasing ideas in us by the delightfulness of their appearance. Fountains, lakes, and rivers are as refreshing to the imagination, as to the soul through which they pass.

There are writers of great distinction, who have made it an argument for Providence, that the whole earth is covered with green, rather than with any other colour, as being such a right mixture of light and shade, that it comforts and strengthens the eye instead of weakening or grieving it. For this reason, several painters have a green cloth hanging near them, to ease the eye upon, after too great an application to their colouring. A famous modern Philosopher accounts for it in the following manner: All colours that are more luminous, over-power and dissipate the animal spirits which are employed in sight; on the contrary, those that are more obscure do not give the animal spirits a sufficient exercise; whereas the rays that produce in us the idea of green, fall upon the eye in such a due proportion, that they give the animal spirits their proper play, and by keeping up the struggle in a just balance, excite a very pleasing and agreeable sensation. Let the cause be what it will, the effect is certain, for which which reason the Poets ascribe to this particular colour the epithet of "Cheerful".

To consider further this double end in the works of nature, and how they are at the same time both useful and entertaining, we find that the most important parts in the vegetable world are those which are the most beautiful. These are the seeds by which the several races of plants are propagated and continued, and which are always lodged in flowers or blossoms. Nature seems to hide her principal design, and to be indulgent in making the earth gay and delightful, while she is carrying on her great work, and intent upon her own preservation. The husbandman after the same manner is employed in laying out the whole country into a kind of garden or landscape, and making every thing smile about him, whilst in reality he thinks of nothing but of the harvest, and encrea which is to arise from it.

We may further observe how Providence has taken care to keep up this cheerfulness in the mind of man, by having formed it after such a manner, as to make it capable of conceiving delight from several objects which seem to have very little use in them, as from the wildness of rocks and deserts, and the like grotesque parts of nature. Those who are versed in Philosophy may still carry this consideration higher, by observing that if Matter had appeared to us endowed only with those real qualities which are actually possessed, it would have made but a very joyless and uncomfortable figure; and why has Providence given it a power of producing in us such imaginary qualities, and taste, and colour, sounds and smells, heat and cold, but that man, while he is conversant in the lower stations of nature, might have his mind chear and delighted with agreeable sensations? In short, the whole universe is a kind of Theatre filled with objects that either raise in us pleasure, amusement, or admiration.

The Reader's own thoughts will suggest to him the vicissitude of day and night, the change of seasons, with all that variety of scenes which diversify the face of nature, and fill the mind with a perpetual succession of beautiful and pleasing images.

I shall not here mention the several entertainments of art, with the pleasures of friendship, books, conversation, and other accidental diversions of life, because I would only take notice of such incitements to a cheerful temper, as offer themselves to persons of all ranks and conditions, and which may sufficiently shew us that Providence did not design this world should be filled with murmurs and repinings, or that the hearts of man should be involved in gloom and melancholy.
I the more inculcate this Cheerfulness of temper, as it is a virtue in which our countrymen are observ'd to be more deficient than any other nation. Melancholy is a kind of Demon that haunts our island, and often conveys her self to us in an easterly wind. A celebrated French Novelift, in opposition to those who begin their romances with the flowry seafon of the year, enters on his story thus: In the gloomy month of November, when the people of England hang and drown themselves, a disconsolate lover walked out into the fields, &c.

Every one ought to fence against the temper of his climate or constitution, and frequently to indulge in himself those considerations which may give him a serenity of mind, and enable him to bear up cheerfully against those little evils and misfortunes which are common to human nature, and which by a right improvement of them will produce a satiety of joy, and an uninterrupted happiness.

At the same time that I would engage my Reader to consider the world in its most agreeable lights, I must own there are many evils which naturally spring up amidst the entertainments that are provided for us; but these, if rightly considered, should be far from overcasting the mind with sorrow, or destroying that cheerfulness of temper which I have been recommending. This intercession of evil with good, and pain with pleasure, in the works of nature, is very truly ascribed by Mr. Locke, in his Essay on human understanding, to a moral reason, in the following words:

_Beyond all this, we may find another reason why God hath scattered up and down several degrees of pleasure and pain, in all the things that environ and afford us, and blended them together, in almost all that our thoughts and senses have to do with; that we finding imperfection, dissatisfaction, and want of complete happiness in all the enjoyments which the creatures can afford us, might be led to seek it in the enjoyment of him, with whom there is fulness of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for evermore._

_Thursday._
WHERE Homer represents Phænx, the tutor of Achilles, as persuading his pupil to lay aside his resentments, and give himself up to the entreaties of his countrymen, the Poet, in order to make him speak in character, ascribes to him a speech full of those Fables and Allegories which old men take delight in relating, and which are very proper for instruction. The Gods, says he, suffer themselves to be prevailed upon by entreaties. When mortals have offended them by their transgressions, they appease them by vows and sacrifices. You must know, Achilles, that PRÄTERS are the daughters of Jupiter. They are crippled by frequent kneeling, have their faces full of care, and wrinkles, and their eyes always cast towards heaven. They are constant attendants on the Goddes ATE, and march behind her. This Goddes walks forward with a bold and haughty air, and being very light of foot, runs through the whole earth, grieving and affliction the sons of men. She gets the start of PRÄTERS, who always follow her, in order to heal those persons whom she wounds. He who honours these daughters of Jupiter, piter, when they draw near to him, receives great benefit from them; but as for him who rejects them, they intreat their Father to give his orders to the Goddess ATE to punish him for his hardness of heart. This noble Allegory needs but little explanation; for whether the Goddess ATE signifies Injury, as some have explained it; or Guilt, in general, as others; or divine Justice, as I am the more apt to think; the interpretation is obvious enough.

I shall produce another heathen Fable relating to prayers, which is of a more diverting kind. One would think by some palliages in it, that it was composed by Lucian, or at least by some Author who has endeavoured to imitate his way of writing; but as Difficulties of this nature are more curious than useful, I shall give my Reader the Fable, without any further inquiries after the Author.

Menippus, the Philosopher, was a second time taken up into heaven by Jupiter, when, for his entertainment, he lifted up a trap-door that was placed by his foot-stool. At its rising, there issued through it such a din of cries as astonished the Philosopher. Upon his asking what they meant, Jupiter told him they were the prayers that were sent up to him from the earth. Menippus, amidst the confusion of voices, which was so great, that nothing less than the ear of Jove could distinguish them, heard the words, Riches, Honour, and Long life repeated in several different tongues and languages. When the first hubbub of sounds was over, the trapdoor being left open, the voices came up more separate and distinct. The first prayer was a very odd one; it came from Athens, and desired Jupiter to increase the wisdom and the beard of his humble supplicant. Menippus knew it by the voice to be the prayer of his friend Lycander the Philosopher. This was succeeded by the petition of one who had just landed a ship, and promised Jupiter, if he took care of it, and returned it home again full of riches, he would make him an offering of a silver-cup. Jupiter thanked him for nothing; and bending down his ear more attentively than ordinary, heard a voice complaining to him of the cruelty of an Ephesian widow, and begging him to breed compassion in her heart: This, says Jupiter, is a very honest fellow, I have received a great deal of income from him; I will not be so cruel to him as to hear his prayers. He was then interrupted with a whole volley of voices, which were made for the health of a tyrannical Prince by his subjects who prayed for him in his presence. Menippus was surprized, after having listened to prayers offered up with so much ardour and devotion, to hear low whispers from the same assembly, exasperating with Jove for suffering such a tyrant to live, live, and asking him how his thunder could be idle? Jupiter was so offended at these prevaricating rafles, that he took down the first vow, and puffed away the last. The Philosopher seeing a great cloud mounting upwards, and making its way directly to the trap-door, inquired of Jupiter what it meant. This, says Jupiter, is the sign of a whole becorn that is offered me by the General of an army, who is very importunate with me to let him cut off an hundred thousand men that are drawn up in array against him: what does the impudent wretch think I see in him, to believe that I will make a sacrifice of so many mortals as good as himself, and all this to his glory, forsooth? But bards, says Jupiter, there is a voice I never heard but in time of danger; it is a rogue that is shipwrecked in the Ionian sea: I saw him on a plank but three days ago, upon his promise to mend his manners; the scoundrel is not worth a groat, and yet has the impudence to offer me a temple if I will keep him from sinking.—But yonder, says he, is a special youth for you; he desires me to take his father, who keeps a great estate from him, out of the miseries of human life. The old fellow shall live till he makes his heart ake, I can tell him that for his pains. This was followed by the soft voice of a fair Lady, desiring Jupiter that she might appear amiable and charming in the sight of her Emperor. As the Philosopher was reflecting on this extraordinary petition, there blew a gentle wind through the trap-door, which at first mislooked for a gale of Zephyrs, but afterwards found it to be a breeze of sighs. They smelt strong of flowers and incense, and were succeeded by most passionate complaints of wounds and torment, fires and arrows, cruelty, despair and death. Menippus fancied that such lamentable cries arose from some general execution, or from wretches lying under the torture; but Jupiter told him that they came up to him from the Isle of Paphos, and that he every day received complaints of the same nature from that whimsical tribe of mortals who are called Lovers. I am so trifled with, says he, by this generation of both sexes, and find it so impossible to please them, whether I grant or refuse their petitions, that I shall order a western wind for the future to intercept them in their passage, and blow them as random upon the earth. The last petition I heard was from a very aged man of near an hundred years old, begging for one year more of life, and then promising to die contented. This is the rarest old fellow! says Jupiter. He has made this prayer to me for above twenty years together. When he was but fifty years old, he defied only that he might live to see his son settled in the world; I granted it. He then begged the same favour for his daughter, and afterwards that that he might see the education of a grandson: when all this was brought about, he puts up a petition that he might live to finish a house he was building. In short, he is an unreasonable old cur, and never wants an excuse; I will bear no more of him. Upon which, he flung down the trap-door in a passion, and was resolved to give no more audiences that day.

Notwithstanding the levity of this fable, the moral of it very well deserves our attention, and is the same with that which has been inculcated by Socrates and Plato, not to mention Juvenal and Persius, who have each of them made the finest satire in their whole works upon this subject. The vanity of men's wishes, which are the natural prayers of the mind, as well as many of those secret devotions which they offer to the Supreme Being, are sufficiently expos'd by it. Among other reasons for not forms of prayer, I have often thought it a very good one; that by this means the folly and extravagance of men's desires may be kept within due bounds, and not break out in absurd and ridiculous petitions on so great and solemn an occasion.

N° 393. Saturday, May 31.

Nescio quo prater solitum dulcedine leti. Virg.

LOOKING over the Letters that have been sent me, I chanced to find the following one, which I received about two years ago from an ingenious friend, who was then in Denmark.

Dear Sir,

"The Summer with you has already taken possession of the fields and woods: now is the season of solitude, and of moving complaints upon trivial sufferings: now the griefs of lovers begin to flow, and their wounds to bleed afresh. I too, at this distance from the softer climates, am not without my discontents at present. You perhaps may laugh at me for a most romantic wretch, when I have disclosed to you the occasion of my uneasiness; and yet I cannot help thinking my unhappy pincel real, in being confined to a region, which is the very reverse of Paradise."
N° 393. The SPECTATOR 467

Paradise. The seafons here are all of them unpleasent, and the country quite deglitute of rural charms. I have not heard a bird sing, nor a brook murmur, nor a breeze whisper, neither have I been blest with the sight of a flowry meadow these two years. Every wind here is a tempest, and every water a turbulent ocean. I hope, when you reflect a little, you will not think the grounds of my complaint in the least frivolous and unbecoming a man of serious thought: since the love of woods, of fields and flowers, of rivers and fountains, seems to be a passion implanted in our natures the most early of any, even before the fair sex had a being.

I am, Sir, &c.

Could I transport myself with a wish from one country to another, I should chose to pass my winter in Spain, my spring in Italy, my summer in England, and my autumn in France. Of all these seafons there is none that can vie with the spring for beauty and delightfulness. It bears the same figure among the seafons of the year, that the morning does among the divisions of the day, or youth among the stages of life. The English summer is pleasanter than that of any other country in Europe, on no other account but because it has a greater mixture of spring in it. The mildnesof our climate, with those frequent refreshments of dews and rains that fall among us, keep up a perpetual cheerfulness in our fields, and fill the hottest months of the year with a lively verdure.

In the opening of the spring, when all nature begins to recover her self, the same animal pleasure which makes the birds sing, and the whole brute creation rejoice, rises very sensibly in the heart of man. I know none of the Poets who have observed so well as Milton the secret overflowings of gladness which diffuse themselves through the mind of the beholder, upon surveying the gay scenes of nature; he has touched upon it twice or thrice in his Paradise Lost, and describes it very beautifully under the name of Vernal delight, in that passage where he represents the Devil himself as almost sensible of it.

Blossoms and fruits at once of golden hue
Appear'd, with gay enamell'd colours mixt;
On which the Sun more glad impress'd his beams
Than in fair evening cloud, or humid bow;
When God bathower'd the earth, so lovely seem'd
That Landscape: and of pure new purer air

Nun a
Meets his approach, and to the heart inspires
Vernal delight, and joy able to drive
All sadness but despair, &c.

Many Authors have written on the Vanity of the Creature, and represented the barrenness of every thing in this world, and its incapacity of producing any solid or substantial happiness. As discoursies of this nature are very useful to the sensual and voluptuous; those speculations which shew the bright side of things, and lay forth those innocent entertainments which are to be met with among the several objects that encompass us, are no less beneficial to men of dark and melancholy tempers. It was for this reason that I endeavoured to recommend a Cheerfulness of mind in my two last Saturday's papers, and which I would still inculcate, not only from the consideration of our selves, and of that Being on whom we depend, not from the general survey of that universe in which we are placed at present, but from reflections on the particular season in which this paper is written. The Creation is a perpetual feast to the mind of a good man, every thing he sees cheers and delights him; Providence has imprinted so many smiles on Nature, that it is impossible for a mind, which is not sunk in more gross and sensual delights, to take a survey of them without several secret sensations of pleasure. The Psalmist has in several of his divine Poems celebrated those beautiful and agreeable scenes which make the heart glad, and produce in it that vernal delight which I have before taken notice of.

Natural Philosophy quickens this taste of the Creation, and renders it not only pleasing to the imagination, but to the understanding. It does not rest in the murmur of brooks, and the melody of birds, in the shade of groves and woods, or in the embroidery of fields and meadows, but considers the several ends of Providence which are served by them, and the wonders of divine Wisdom which appear in them. It heightens the pleasures of the eye, and raises such a rational admiration in the Soul as is little inferior to devotion.

It is not in the power of every one to offer up this kind of worship to the great Author of Nature, and to indulge these more refined meditations of heart, which are doubtless highly acceptable in his sight; I shall therefore conclude this short Essay on that pleasure which the mind naturally conceives from the present season of the year, by the recommending of a practice for which every one has sufficient abilities.
I would have my Readers endeavour to moralize this natural pleasure of the Soul, and to improve this vernal delight, as Milton calls it, into a Christian virtue. When we find our selves inspired with this pleasing sentiment, this secret satisfaction and complacency arising from the beauties of the Creation, let us consider to whom we stand indebted for all these entertainments of sense, and who it is that thus opens his hand and fills the world with good. The Apostle instructs us to take advantage of our present temper of mind, to graft upon it such a religious exercise as is particularly conformable to it, by that precept which advises those who are sad to pray, and those who are merry to sing psalms. The cheerfulness of heart which springs up in us from the survey of Nature's works, is an admirable preparation for gratitude. The mind has gone a great way towards Praise and Thanksgiving, that is filled with such a secret gladness; a grateful reflection on the Supreme Cause who produces it, sanctifies it in the Soul, and gives it its proper value. Such an habitual disposition of mind consecrates every field and wood, turns an ordinary walk into a morning or evening sacrifice, and will improve those transient gleams of joy, which naturally brighten up and refresh the Soul on such occasions, into an inviolable and perpetual state of bliss and happiness.

N° 397. Thursday, June 5.

-----Dolor ipse deserta

Fecerat-------

Ovid.

As the Stoick Philosophers discard all passions in general, they will not allow a wise man so much as to pity the afflictions of another. If thou seest thy friend in trouble, says Epictetus, thou mayst put on a look of sorrow, and condole with him, but take care that thy sorrow be not real. The more rigid of this sect would not comply so far as to shew even such an outward appearance of grief; but when one told them of any calamity that had befallen even the nearest of their acquaintance, fance, would immediately reply, What is that to me? If you aggravated the circumstances of the affliction, and chewed how one misfortune was followed by another, the answer was still, All this may be true, but what is it to me?

For my own part, I am of opinion, Compassion does not only refine and civilize human nature, but has something in it more pleasing and agreeable than what can be met with in such an indolent happiness, such an indifference to mankind as that in which the Stoicks placed their wisdom. As Love is the most delightful passion, pity is nothing else but love softened by a degree of sorrow: in short, it is a kind of pleasing anguish, as well as generous sympathy, that knits mankind together, and blends them in the same common lot.

Those who have laid down rules for Rhetorick or Poetry, advise the writer to work himself up, if possible, to the pitch of sorrow which he endeavours to produce in others. There are none therefore who stir up pity so much as those who indite their own sufferings. Grief has a natural eloquence belonging to it, and breaks out in more moving sentiments than can be supplied by the finest imagination. Nature on this occasion dictates a thousand passionate things which cannot be supplied by art.

It is for this reason that the short speeches or sentences which we often meet with in histories, make a deeper impression on the mind of the Reader, than the most laboured strokes in a well written Tragedy. Truth and matter of fact sets the person actually before us in the one, whom fiction places at a greater distance from us in the other. I do not remember to have seen any ancient or modern story more affecting than a letter of Ann of Bologna, wife to King Henry the Eighth, and mother to Queen Elizabeth, which is still extant in the Cotton Library, as written by her own hand.

Shakespeare himself could not have made her talk in a strain so suitable to her condition and character. One sees in it the expostulations of a flighted Lover, the resentments of an injured Woman, and the forrows of an imprisoned Queen. I need not acquaint my Reader that this Princess was then under prosecution for disloyalty to the King's bed, and that she was afterwards publickly beheaded upon the same account, though this prosecution was believed by many to proceed, as she her self intimates, rather from the King's love to Jane Seymour, than from any actual crime in Ann of Bologna.
Queen Ann Boleyn's last Letter to King Henry.

SIR,

"YOUR Grace's displeasure, and my imprisonment, are things so strange unto me, as what to write, or what to excuse, I am altogether ignorant. Whereas you send unto me (willing me to confess a truth, and so obtain your favour) by such an one, whom you know to be mine ancient professed enemy, I no sooner received this message by him, than I rightly conceived your meaning; and if, as you say, confessing a truth indeed may procure my safety, I shall with all willingnes and duty perform your command.

"But let not your Grace ever imagine, that your poor wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault, where not so much as a thought thereof preceded. And to speak a truth, never Prince had wife more loyal in all duty, and in all true affection, than you have ever found in Ann Boleyn: with which name and place I could willingly have contented my self, if God and your Grace's pleasure had been so pleased. Neither did I at any time so far forget my self in my exaltation, or received Queenship, but that I always looked for such an alteration as now I find; for the ground of my preferment being on no firmer foundation than your Grace's fancy, the least alteration I knew was fit and sufficient to draw that fancy to some other subject. You have chosen me, from a low estate, to be your Queen and companion, far beyond my desert and desire. If then you found me worthy of such honour, good your Grace let not any light fancy, or bad counsel of mine enemies, withdraw your Princely favour from me; neither let that fault, that unworthy fault, of a disloyal heart towards your good Grace, ever cast so foul a blot on your most dutifull wife, and the Infant-princes your daughter. Try me, good King, but let me have a lawful tryal, and let not my sworn enemies fit as my accusers and judges; yea let me receive an open tryal, for my truth shall fear no open shame; then shall you see either mine innocence cleared, your surpicion and conscience satisfied, the ignominy and slander of the world stopped, or my guilt openly declared. So that whatsoever God or you may determine of me, your Grace may be freed from an open cenfure, and mine offence being so lawfully proved, your Grace is at liberty, both before God and man, not only to execute worthy punishment on me as an unlawful wife, but to follow your affection, already fetled on that party, for whose sake I am now as I am, whose name I could some good while..."
"while since have pointed unto, your Grace being not ignorant of my suspicion therein.
" But if you have already determined of me, and that not only my death, but an infamous slander must bring you the enjoying of your desired happiness; then I desire of God, that he will pardon your great sin therein, and likewise mine enemies, the instruments thereof; and that he will now call you to a strict account for your unprincely and cruel usage of me, at his general judgment seat, where both you and my self must shortly appear, and in whole judgment I doubt not (whatsoever the world may think of me) mine innocence shall be openly known, and sufficiently cleared.
" My last and only request shall be, that my self may only bear the burden of your Grace's displeasure, and that it may not touch the innocent souls of those poor Gentlemen, who (as I understand) are likewise in strait imprisonment for my sake. If ever I have found favour in your sight, if ever the name of Ann Boleyn hath been pleasing in your ears, then let me obtain this request, and I will so leave to trouble your Grace any further, with mine earnest prayers to the Trinity to have your Grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions. From my doleful prison in the Tower, this sixth of May;
Your most loyal and ever faithful wife, Ann Boleyn.

No 399. Saturday, July 7.

Ut nemo in se se nescit descendere! —— Perf.

Hypocrifie, at the fashionable end of the town, is very different from hypocrifie in the city. The modish hypocrifte endeavors to appear more vicious than he really is, the other kind of hypocrifte more virtuous. The former is afraid of every thing that has the shew of religion in it, and would be thought engaged in many criminal gallantries and amours, which he is not guilty of. The latter assumes a face of sanctity, and covers a multitude of vices under a seeming religious deportment.

But
But there is another kind of Hypocrisy, which differs from both these, and which I intend to make the subject of this paper: I mean that Hypocrisy, by which a man does not only deceive the world, but very often imposes on himself; that Hypocrisy, which conceals his own heart from him, and makes him believe he is more virtuous than he really is, and either not attend to his vices, or mistake even his vices for virtues. It is this fatal hypocrisy and self-deceit, which is taken notice of in these words, Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou me from secret faults.

If the open Professors of impiety deserve the utmost application and endeavours of moral writers to recover them from vice and folly, how much more may those lay a claim to their care and compassion, who are walking in the paths of death, while they fancy themselves engaged in a course of virtue! I shall endeavour, therefore, to lay down some rules for the discovery of those vices that lurk in the secret corners of the soul, and to shew my Reader those methods by which he may arrive at a true and impartial knowledge of himself. The usual means prescribed for this purpose, are to examine our selves by the rules which are laid down for our direction in sacred writ, and to compare our lives with the life of that person who acted up to the perfection of human nature, and is the standing example, as well as the great guide and instructor, of those who receive his doctrines. Though these two heads cannot be too much insisted upon, I shall but just mention them, since they have been handled by many great and eminent writers.

I would therefore propose the following methods to the consideration of such as would find out their secret faults, and make a true estimate of themselves.

In the first place, let them consider well what are the characters which they bear among their enemies. Our friends very often flatter us, as much as our own hearts. They either do not see our faults, or conceal them from us, or soften them by their representations, after such a manner, that we think them too trivial to be taken notice of. An adversary, on the contrary, makes a stricter search into us, discovers every flaw and imperfection in our tempers, and though his malice may set them in too strong a light, it has generally some ground for what it advances. A friend exaggerates a man's virtues, an enemy inflames his crimes. A wise man should give a just attention to both of them, so far as they may tend to the improvement of the one, and diminution of the other. Plutarch has written an Essay on the benefits which a man may receive from his enemies.
mies, and, among the good fruits of enmity, mentions this in particular, that by the reproaches which it casts upon us we see the worst side of our selves, and open our eyes to several blemishes and defects in our lives and conversations, which we should not have observed, without the help of such ill-natured monitors.

In order likewise to come at a true knowledge of our selves, we should consider on the other hand how far we may deserve the praises and approbations which the world bestows upon us; whether the actions they celebrate proceed from laudable and worthy motives, and how far we are really possess’d of the virtues which gain us applause amongst those with whom we converse. Such a reflection is absolutely necessary, if we consider how apt we are either to value or condemn our selves by the opinions of others, and to sacrifice the report of our own hearts to the judgment of the world.

In the next place, that we may not deceive our selves in a point of so much importance, we should not lay too great a stress on any supposed virtues we possess that are of a doubtful nature: and such we may esteem all those in which multitudes of men different from us, who are as good and wise as our selves. We should always act with great caution and circumspection, in points where it is not impossible that we may be deceived. Intemperate zeal, bigotry and persecution for any party or opinion, how praise-worthy soever they may appear to weak men of our own principles, produce infinite calamities among mankind, and are highly criminal in their own nature; and yet how many persons eminent for piety suffer such monstrous and absurd principles of action to take root in their minds under the colour of virtues? For my own part, I must own I never yet knew any party so just and reasonable, that a man could follow it in its height and violence, and at the same time be innocent.

We should likewise be very apprehensive of those actions which proceed from natural constitution, favourite passions, particular education, or whatever promotes our worldly interest or advantage. In these and the like cases, a man’s judgment is easily perverted, and a wrong bias hung upon his mind. These are the inlets of prejudice, the unguarded avenues of the mind, by which a thousand errors and secret faults find admittance, without being observed or taken notice of. A wise man will suspect those actions to which he is directed by something besides Reason, and always apprehend some concealed evil in every resolution that is of a disputable nature, when it is conformable to his particular temper, his age, or way of life, or when it favours his pleasure or his profit.
There is nothing of greater importance to us, than thus diligently to sift our thoughts, and examine all these dark recesses of the mind, if we would establish our souls in such a solid and substantial virtue, as will turn to account in that great day, when it must stand the test of infinite wisdom and justice.

I shall conclude this Essay with observing, that the two kinds of Hypocrisy I have here spoken of, namely, that of deceiving the world, and that of imposing on our selves, are touched with wonderful beauty in the hundred thirty ninth Psalm. The folly of the first kind of Hypocrisy is there set forth by reflections on God's Omniscience and Omnipresence, which are celebrated in as noble strains of Poetry as any other I ever met with, either sacred or profane. The other kind of Hypocrisy, whereby a man deceives himself, is intimated in the two last verses, where the Psalmist addresses himself to the great Searcher of hearts in that emphatical petition; Try me, O God, and seek the ground of my heart: prove me, and examine my thoughts. Look well if there be any way of wickedness in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.

Qui meus hominum multorum vidit— Hor.

When I consider this great city in its several quarters and divisions, I look upon it as an aggregate of various nations distinguished from each other by their respective customs, manners and interests. The courts of two countries do not so much differ from one another, as the court and city in their peculiar ways of life and conversation. In short, the inhabitants of St. James's, notwithstanding they live under the same laws, and speak the same language, are a distinct people from those of Cheap side, who are likewise removed from those of the Temple on the one side, and those of Smithfield on the other, by several climates and degrees in their way of thinking and conversing together.

For this reason, when any public affair is upon the anvil, I love to hear the reflections that arise upon it in the several districts and parishes of London.
London and Westminster, and to ramble up and down a whole day together, in order to make my self acquainted with the opinions of my ingenuous countrymen. By this means I know the faces of all the principal Politicians within the bills of mortality; and as every Coffee-house has some particular Statesman belonging to it, who is the mouth of the street where he lives, I always take care to place my self near him, in order to know his judgment on the present posture of affairs. The last progress that I made with this intention, was about three months ago, when we had a current report of the King of France’s death. As I foresaw this would produce a new face of things in Europe, and many curious speculations in our British Coffee-houses, I was very desirous to learn the thoughts of our most eminent Politicians on that occasion.

That I might begin as near the fountain-head as possible, I first of all called in at St. James’s, where I found the whole outward room in a buzz of politics. The speculations were but very indifferent towards the door, but grew finer as you advanced to the upper end of the room, and were so very much improved by a knot of Theorists, who sat in the inner room, within the fleas of the coffee-pot, that I there heard the whole Spanish Monarchy disposed of, and all the line of Bourbon provided for, in less than a quarter of an hour.

I afterwards called in at Giles’s, where I saw a board of French Gentlemen sitting upon the life and death of their Grand Monarque. Those among them who had espoused the Whigg interest, very positively affirmed, that he departed this life about a week since, and therefore proceeded without any further delay to the release of their friends on the Gallies, and to their own re-establishment; but finding they could not agree among themselves, I proceeded on my intended progress.

Upon my arrival at Jenny Man’s, I saw an alert young fellow that cocked his hat upon a friend of his who entered just at the same time with my self, and accosted him after the following manner. Well Jack, the old prig is dead at last. Sharp’s the word. Now or never boy. Up to the walls of Paris directly. With several other deep reflections of the same nature.

I met with very little variation in the Politics between Charing-crofs and Covent-Garden. And upon my going into Will’s I found their discourse was gone off from the death of the French King to that of Monsieur Boileau, Racine, Corneille, and several other Poets, whom they regretted on this occasion, as persons who would have obliged the world with very noble Elegies on the death of so great a Prince, and so eminent a Patron of learning.
At a Coffee-house near the Temple, I found a couple of young Gentlemen engaged very smartly in a dispute on the succession to the Spanish Monarchy. One of them seemed to have been retained as Advocate for the Duke of Anjou, the other for his Imperial Majesty. They were both for regulating the title to that Kingdom by the statute laws of England; but finding them going out of my depth I passed forward to Paul’s Churchyard, where I listened with great attention to a learned man, who gave the company an account of the deplorable state of France during the minority of the deceased King.

I then turned on my right hand into Fish-street, where the chief Politician of that quarter, upon hearing the news, (after having taken a pipe of tobacco, and ruminated for some time) If, says he, the King of France is certainly dead, we shall have plenty of Mackerell this season; our Fishery will not be disturbed by privateers, as it has been for these ten years past. He afterwards considered how the death of this great man would affect our Pilchards, and by several other remarks infused a general joy into his whole audience.

I afterwards entered a By-coffee-house that stood at the upper end of a narrow lane, where I met with a Nonjuror, engaged very warmly with a Lacedemocrate, who was the great supporter of a neighbouring conventicle. The matter in debate was, whether the late French King was most like Augustus Caesar, or Nero. The controversy was carried on with great heat on both sides, and as each of them looked upon me very frequently during the course of their debate, I was under some apprehension that they would appeal to me, and therefore laid down my penny at the bar, and made the best of my way to Cheapside.

There gazed upon the signs for some time before I found one to my purpose. The first object I met in the coffee-room was a person who expressed a great grief for the death of the French King; but upon his explaining himself, I found his sorrow did not arise from the loss of the Monarch, but for his having sold out of the Bank about three days before he heard the news of it; upon which a Haberdasher, who was the Oracle of the coffee-house, and had his circle of admirers about him, called several to witnesses that he had declared his opinion above a week before, that the French King was certainly dead; to which he added, that considering the late advices we had received from France, it was impossible that it could be otherwise. As he was laying these together, and dictating to his hearers with great authority, there came in a Gentleman from Garraway’s, who told us that there were several Letters from France just just come in, with advice that the King was in good health, and was gone out a hunting the very morning the Post came away: upon which the haberdsheer stole off his hat that hung upon a wooden peg by him, and retired to his shop with great confusion. This intelligence put a stop to my travels, which I had prosecuted with much satisfaction; not being a little pleased to hear so many different opinions upon so great an event, and to observe how naturally upon such a piece of news every one is apt to consider it with a regard to his own particular interest and advantage.

Hom.

I am very sorry to find, by the Opera-bills for this day, that we are likely to lose the greatest performer in dramatic music that is now living, or that perhaps ever appeared upon a stage. I need not acquaint my Reader, that I am speaking of Signior Nivolini. The town is highly obliged to that excellent artiff, for having shewn us the Italian music in its perfection, as well as for that generous approbation he lately gave to an Opera of our own country, in which the composer endeavoured to do justice to the beauty of the words, by following that noble examiple, which has been set him by the greatest foreign masters in that art.
I could heartily wish there was the same application and endeavours to cultivate and improve our Church-music, as have been lately bestowed on that of the stage. Our Composers have one very great incitement to it: they are sure to meet with excellent words, and, at the same time, a wonderful variety of them. There is no passion that is not finely expressed in those parts of the inspired writings, which are proper for divine Songs and Anthems.

There is a certain coldness and indifference in the phrasals of our European languages, when they are compared with the oriental forms of speech;
speech; and it happens very luckily, that the Hebrew Idioms run into the English tongue with a particular grace and beauty. Our language has received innumerable elegancies and improvements, from that infusion of Hebrew, which are derived to it out of the poetical passages in holy Writ. They give a force and energy to our expressions, warm and animate our language, and convey our thoughts in more ardent and intense phrasal, than any that are to be met with in our own tongue. There is something so pathetic in this kind of description, that it often sets the mind in a flame, and makes our hearts burn within us. How cold and dead does a prayer appear, that is composed in the most elegant and polite forms of speech, which are natural to our tongue, when it is not heightened by that solemnity of phrase, which may be drawn from the sacred writings. It has been said by some of the ancients, that if the Gods were to talk with men, they would certainly speak in Plato's style; but I think we may say, with justice, that when mortals converse with their Creator, they cannot do it in so proper a style as in that of the holy Scriptures.

If any one would judge of the beauties of poetry that are to be met with in the divine writings, and examine how kindly the Hebrew manners of speech mix and incorporate with the English language; after having perused the book of Psalms, let him read a literal translation of Horace or Pindar. He will find in these two last such an absurdity and confusion of style with such a comparative poverty of imagination, as will make him very sensible of what I have been here advancing.

Since we have therefore such a treasury of words, so beautiful in themselves, and so proper for the airs of Music, I cannot but wonder that persons of disposition should give so little attention and encouragement to that kind of Music, which would have its foundation in Reason, and which would improve our virtue in proportion as it raised our delight. The passions that are excited by ordinary compositions, generally flow from such silly and absurd occasions, that a man is ashamed to reflect upon them seriously: but the fear, the love, the sorrow, the indignation that are awakened in the mind by Hymns and Anthems, make the heart better, and proceed from such causes as are altogether reasonable and praiseworthy. Pleasure and duty go hand in hand, and the greater our satisfaction is, the greater is our religion.

Music among those who were tilled the chosen people, was a religious art. The songs of Zion, which we have reason to believe were in high repute among the Courts of the eastern Monarchs, were nothing else but Psalms and pieces of poetry that adored or celebrated the supreme Being.
Being. The greatest Conqueror in this holy nation, after the manner of the old Grecian Lyricks, did not only compose the words of his divine Odes, but generally set them to musick himself: after which, his works, though they were consecrated to the Tabernacle, became the national entertainment, as well as the devotion of his people.

The first original of the Drama was a religious worship consisting only of a Chorus, which was nothing else but an hymn to a Deity. As luxury and voluptuousness prevailed over innocence and religion, this form of worship degenerated into Tragedies; in which however the Chorus so far remembered its first office, as to brand every thing that was vicious, and recommend every thing that was laudable, to intercede with Heaven for the innocent, and to implore its vengeance on the criminal.

Homer and Hesiod intimate to us how this art should be applied, when they represent the Muses as surrounding Jupiter, and warbling their Hymns about his throne. I might shew, from innumerable passages in ancient writers, not only that vocal and instrumental Musick were made use of in their religious worship, but that their most favourite diversions were filled with songs and hymns to their respective Deities. Had we frequent entertainments of this nature among us, they would not a little purifie and exalt our passions, give our thoughts a proper turn, and cherishe those divine impulses in the soul, which every one feels that has not stifled them by sensual and immoderate pleasures.

Music, when thus applied, raises noble hints in the mind of the hearer, and fills it with great conceptions. It strengthens devotion, and advances praise into rapture. It lengthens out every act of worship, and produces more lasting and permanent impressions in the mind, than those which accompany any transient form of words that are uttered in the ordinary method of religious worship.

Tuesday,
Most foreign writers who have given any character of the English nation, whatever vices they ascribe to it, allow in general, that the people are naturally modest. It proceeds perhaps from this our national virtue, that our Orators are observed to make use of less gesture or action than those of other countries. Our Preachers stand rock-still in the Pulpit, and will not so much as move a finger to set off the best Sermons in the world. We meet with the same speaking statues at our bars, and in all publick places of debate. Our words flow from us in a smooth continued stream, without those trainings of the voice, motions of the body, and majesty of the hand, which are so much celebrated in the Orators of Greece and Rome. We can talk of life and death in cold blood, and keep our temper in a discourse which turns upon every thing that is dear to us. Though our zeal breaks out in the finest tropes and figures, it is not able to stir a limb about us. I have heard it observed more than once by those who have seen Italy, that an untravelled Englishman cannot relish all the beauties of Italian pictures, because the pollutions which are expressed in them are often such as are peculiar to that country. One who has not seen an Italian in the Pulpit, will not know what to make of that noble gesture in Raphael's picture of St. Paul preaching at Athens, where the Apostle is represented as lifting up both his arms, and pouring out the thunder of his Rhetorick amidst an audience of pagan Philosophers.

It is certain that proper gestures and vehement exertions of the voice cannot be too much studied by a publick Orator. They are a kind of Comment to what he utters, and enforce every thing he says, with weak hearers, better than the strongest argument he can make use of. They keep the audience awake, and fix their attention to what is delivered to them, at the same time that they shew the speaker is in earnest, and affected himself with what he so passionately recommends.
mends to others. Violent gesture and vociferation naturally shake the hearts of the ignorant, and fill them with a kind of religious horror. Nothing is more frequent than to see women weep and tremble at the sight of a moving preacher, though he is placed quite out of their hearing; as in England we very frequently see people lulled asleep with solid and elaborated discourses of piety, who would be warmed and transported out of themselves by the bellowings and distortions of Enthusiasm.

If nonsense, when accompanied with such an emotion of voice and body, has such an influence on men's minds, what might we not expect from many of those admirable discourses which are printed in our tongue, were they delivered with a becoming fervour, and with the most agreeable graces of voice and gesture?

We are told, that the great Latin Orator very much impaired his health by this laterum contentio, this vehemence of action, with which he used to deliver himself. The Greek Orator was likewise so very famous for this particular in Rhetorick, that one of his antagonists, whom he had banished from Athens, reading over the oration which had procured his banishment, and seeing his friends admire it, could not forbear asking them, if they were so much affected by the bare reading of it, how much more they would have been alarmed, had they heard him actually throwing out such a storm of eloquence?

How cold and dead a figure, in comparison of these two great men, does an Orator often make at the British bar, holding up his head with the most insipid serenity, and stroking the sides of a long wig that reaches down to his middle? The truth of it is, there is often nothing more ridiculous than the gestures of an English speaker; you see some of them running their hands into their pockets as far as ever they can thrust them, and others looking with great attention on a piece of paper that has nothing written in it; you may see many a man, a learned man, a politician, smoking a pipe, holding up his head, and sometimes the button, during the whole course of his harangue. A deaf man would think he was cheapening a beaver, when perhaps he is talking of the fate of the British nation. I remember, when I was a young man, and used to frequent Westminster-Hall, there was a Counsellor, who never pleaded without a piece of pack-thread in his hand, which he used to twist about a thumb, or a finger, all the while he was speaking; the wags of those days used to call it the thread of his discourse, for he was not able to utter a word without it. One of his clients, who was more merry than wise, stole it from him one day in
in the midst of his pleading, but he had better have let it alone, for he lost his cause by his jest.

I have all along acknowledged my self to be a dumb man, and therefore may be thought a very improper person to give rules for oratory; but I believe every one will agree with me in this, that we ought either to lay aside all kinds of gesture, (which seems to be very suitable to the genius of our nation) or at least to make use of such only as are graceful and expressive.

GRATIEN very often recommends the fine taste, as the utmost perfection of an accomplished man. As this word arises very often in conversation, I shall endeavour to give some account of it, and to lay down rules how we may know whether we are possessed of it, and how we may acquire that fine taste of writing, which is so much talked of among the polite world.

Most Languages make use of this metaphor, to express that faculty of the mind, which distinguishes all the most concealed faults and nicest perfections in writing. We may be sure this metaphor would not have been so general in all tongues, had there not been a very great conformity between that mental taste, which is the subject of this paper, and that sensitive taste which gives us a relish of every different flavour that affects the palate. Accordingly we find, there are as many degrees of refinement in the intellectual faculty, as in the sense, which is marked out by this common denomination.

I knew a person who possessed the one in so great a perfection, that after having tasted ten different kinds of tea, he would distinguish, without seeing the colour of it, the particular sort which was offered him; and not only so, but any two sorts of them that were mixed together in an equal proportion; nay, he has carried the experiment so far, as upon tasting the composition of three different sorts, to name the parcels from whence whence the several ingredients were taken. A man of a fine taste in writing will discern, after the same manner, not only the general beauties and imperfections of an Author, but discover the several ways of thinking, and expressing himself, which diversify him from all other Authors, with the several foreign infusions of thought and language, and the particular Authors from whom they were borrowed.

After having thus far explained what is generally meant by a fine taste in writing, and shewn the propriety of the metaphor which is used on this occasion, I think I may define it to be that faculty of the soul, which discerns the beauties of an Author with pleasure, and the imperfections with dislike. If a man would know whether he is possessed of this faculty, I would have him read over the celebrated works of antiquity, which have stood the test of so many different ages and countries; or those works among the moderns, which have the sanction of the politer part of our contemporaries. If upon the perusal of such writings he does not find himself delighted in an extraordinary manner, or if, upon reading the admired passages in such Authors, he finds a coldness and indifference in his thoughts, he ought to conclude, not (as is too usual among the fainéants Readers) that the Author wants those perfections which have been admired in him, but that he himself wants the faculty of discovering them.

He should, in the second place, be very careful to observe, whether he tastes the distinguishing perfections, or, if he may be allowed to call them so, the specific qualities of the Author whom he peruses; whether he is particularly pleased with Lives for his manner of telling a story, with Sallust for his entering into those internal principles of action which arise from the characters and manners of the persons he describes; or with Tacitus for his displaying those outward motives of safety and interest, which give birth to the whole series of transactions which he relates.

He may likewise consider, how differently he is affected by the same thought, which presents itself in a great writer, from what he is when he finds it delivered by a person of an ordinary Genius. For there is as much difference in apprehending a thought clothed in Cicero’s language, and that of a common Author, as in seeing an object by the light of a taper, or by the light of the Sun.

It is very difficult to lay down rules for the acquirement of such a taste as that I am here speaking of. The faculty must in some degree be born with us, and it very often happens, that those who have other qualities in perfection, are wholly void of this. One of the most eminent Mathema-
Mathematicians of the Age has assured me, that the greatest pleasure he took in reading Virgil, was in examining Aeneas his voyage by the map; as I question not but many a modern compiler of history, would be delighted with little more in that divine Author, than in the bare matters of fact.

But notwithstanding this faculty must in some measure be born with us, there are several methods for cultivating and improving it, and without which it will be very uncertain, and of little use to the person that possesses it. The most natural method for this purpose is to be conversant among the writings of the most polite Authors. A man who has any relish for fine writing, either discovers new beauties, or receives stronger impressions from the masterly strokes of a great Author every time he peruses him: Besides that he naturally wears himself into the same manner of speaking and thinking.

Conversation with men of a polite genius is another method of improving our natural taste. It is impossible for a man of the greatest parts to consider any thing in its whole extent, and in all its variety of lights. Every man, besides those general observations which are to be made upon an Author, forms several reflections that are peculiar to his own manner of thinking; so that conversation will naturally furnish us with hints which we did not attend to, and make us enjoy other mens parts and reflections as well as our own. This is the best reason I can give for the observation which several have made, that men of great genius in the same way of writing seldom rise up finely, but at certain periods of time appear together, and in a body; as they did at Rome in the reign of Augustus, and in Greece about the Age of Socrates. I cannot think that Corneille, Racine, Moliere, Boileau, la Fontaine, Bruyere, Bossu, or the Dacier, would have written so well as they have done, had they not been friends and contemporaries.

It is likewise necessary for a man who would form to himself a finished taste of good writing, to be well versed in the works of the best Critics both ancient and modern. I must confess that I could wish there were Authors of this kind, who, beside the mechanical rules which a man of very little taste may discourse upon, would enter into the very spirit and soul of fine writing, and shew us the several sources of that pleasure which rises in the mind upon the perusal of a noble work. Thus though in poetry it be absolutely necessary that the unities of time, place, and action, with other points of the same nature, should be thoroughly explained and understood; there is still something more essential to the art, something that elevates and astonishes the fancy, and gives a greatness of mind to the Reader, which few of the Critics besides Longinus have considered.

Our general taste in England is for epigram, turns of wit, and forced conceits, which have no manner of influence, either for the bettering or enlarging the mind of him who reads them, and have been carefully avoided by the greatest writers, both among the ancients and moderns. I have endeavoured in several of my Speculations to banish this Gothic taste, which has taken possession among us. I entertained the town, for a week together, with an Essay upon Wit, in which I endeavoured to detect several of those false kinds which have been admired in the different Ages of the world; and at the same time to shew wherein the nature of true wit consists. I afterwards gave an instance of the great force which lies in a natural simplicity of thought to affect the mind of the Reader, from such vulgar pieces as have little else besides this single qualification to recommend them. I have likewise examined the works of the greatest Poets which our nation or perhaps any other has produced, and particularized most of those rational and manly beauties which give a value to that divine work. I shall next Saturday enter upon an Essay on the pleasures of the Imagination, which, though it shall consider that subject at large, will perhaps suggest to the Reader what it is that gives a beauty to many passages of the finest writers both in prose and verse. As an undertaking of this nature is entirely new, I question not but it will be received with candour.

No. 411. Saturday, June 21.

Avium Pieridum peragro loca, nullius ante
Trita solo; juxta integros accedere fontes;
Etque baurinæ: ------

Lucri.

Our Sight is the most perfect and most delightful of all our senses. It fills the mind with the largest variety of ideas, converses with its objects at the greatest distance, and continues the longest in action.
action without being tired or satiated with its proper enjoyments. The fence of Feeling can indeed give us a notion of extension, shape, and all other ideas that enter at the eye, except colours; but at the same time it is very much frightened and confined in its operations, to the number, bulk, and distance of its particular objects. Our Sight seems designed to supply all these defects, and may be considered as a more delicate and delusive kind of touch, that spreads itself over an infinite multitude of bodies, comprehends the largest figures, and brings into our reach some of the most remote parts of the universe.

It is this fence which furnishes the Imagination with its ideas; so that by the pleasures of the imagination or fancy (which I shall use promiscuously) I here mean such as arise from visible objects, either when we have them actually in our view, or when we call up their ideas into our minds by paintings, statues, descriptions, or any the like occasion. We cannot indeed have a single image in the fancy that did not make its first entrance through the sight; but we have the power of retaining, altering, and compounding those images, which we have once received, into all the varieties of picture and vision that are most agreeable to the imagination; for by this faculty a man in a dungeon is capable of entertaining himself with scenes and landscapes more beautiful than any that can be found in the whole compass of nature.

There are few words in the English language which are employed in a more loose and uncinemenced fence than those of the fancy and the imagination. I therefore thought it necessary to fix and determine the notion of these two words, as I intend to make use of them in the thread of my following speculations, that the reader may conceive rightly what is the subject which I proceed upon. I must therefore desire him to remember, that by the pleasures of the imagination, I mean only such pleasures as arise originally from sight, and that I divide these pleasures into two kinds: my design being first of all to discourse of those primary pleasures of the imagination, which entirely proceed from such objects as are before our eyes; and in the next place to speak of those secondary pleasures of the imagination which flow from the ideas of visible objects, when the objects are not actually before the eye, but are called up into our memories, or formed into agreeable visions of things that are either absent or fictitious.

The pleasures of the imagination, taken in their full extent, are not so gross as those of fancy, nor so refined as those of the understanding.
The last are, indeed, more preferable, because they are founded on some new new knowledge or improvement in the mind of man: yet it must be confess, that those of the imagination are as great and as transporting as the other. A beautiful prospect delights the soul, as much as a demonstration; and a Description in Homer has charmed more Readers than a Chapter in Aristotle. Besides, the pleasures of the imagination have this advantage, above those of the understanding, that they are more obvious, and more easy to be acquired. Is it not opening the eye, and the scene enters. The colours paint themselves on the fancy, with very little attention of thought or application of mind in the beholder. We are struck, we know not how, with the symmetry of any thing we see, and immediately affix to the beauty of an object, without enquiring into the particular causes and occasions of it.

A man of a polite imagination is let into a great many pleasures, that the vulgar are not capable of receiving. He can converse with a picture, and find an agreeable companion in a statue. He meets with a secret refreshment in a description, and often feels a greater satisfaction in the prospect of fields and meadows, than another does in possession. It gives him, indeed, a kind of property in every thing he sees, and makes the most rude uncultivated parts of nature administer to his pleasures: So that he looks upon the world, as it were in another light, and discovers in it a multitude of charms, that conceal themselves from the generality of mankind.

There are, indeed, but very few who know how to be idle and inocent, or have a relish of any pleasures that are not criminal; every diversion they take is at the expense of some one virtue or another, and their very first step out of business is into vice or folly. A man should endeavour, therefore, to make the sphere of his innocent pleasures as wide as possible, that he may retire into them with safety, and find in them such a satisfaction as a wise man would not blush to take. Of this nature are those of the imagination, which do not require such a bent of thought as is necessary to our more serious employments, nor, at the same time, suffer the mind to sink into that negligence and reminiscence, which are apt to accompany our more sensual delights, but, like a gentle exercise to the faculties, awaken them from sloth and indolence, without putting them upon any labour or difficulty.

We might here add, that the pleasures of the fancy are more conductive to health, than those of the understanding, which are worked out by dint of thinking, and attended with too violent a labour of the brain. Delightful scenes, whether in nature, painting, or poetry, have a kindly influence on the body, as well as the mind, and not only serve to clear and brighten the imagination, but are able to disperse grief and melancholy, and to set the animal spirits in pleasing and agreeable motions.
For this reason Sir Francis Bacon, in his Essay upon Health, has not thought it improper to prescribe, to his Reader a poem or a prospect,
where he particularly dilates him from knotty and subtle disquisitions, and advises him to pursue studies, that fill the mind with splendid and illustrious objects, as histories, fables, and contemplations of nature.
I have in this paper, by way of introduction, settled the notion of these pleasures of the imagination which are the subject of my present undertaking, and endeavoured, by several considerations, to recommend to my Reader the pursuit of those pleasures. I shall, in my next paper, examine the several sources from whence these pleasures are derived.

Shall first consider those pleasures of the imagination, which arise from the actual view and survey of outward objects: and these, I think, all proceed from the sight of what is Great, Uncommon or Beautiful.
There may, indeed, be something so terrible or offensive, that the horror or loathliness of an object may overbear the pleasure which re-tufts from its Greatness, Novelty, or Beauty; but still there will be such a mixture of delight in the very disgust it gives us, as any of these three qualifications are most conspicuous and prevailing.

By Greatness, I do not only mean the bulk of any single object, but the largeness of a whole view, considered as one entire piece. Such are the prospects of an open champaign country, a vault uncultivated desert, of huge heaps of mountains, high rocks and precipices, or a wide expanse of waters, where we are not struck with the novelty or beauty of the fight, but with that rude kind of magnificence which appears in many of these stupendous works of nature. Our imagination loves to be filled with an object, or to grasp at anything that is too big for its capacity.

We
We are flung into a pleasing astonishment at such unbounded views, and feel a delightful stillness and amazement in the Soul at the apprehension of them. The mind of man naturally hates every thing that looks like a restraint upon it, and is apt to fancy it self under a sort of confinement, when the sight is pent up in a narrow compass, and shortened on every side by the neighbourhood of walls or mountains. On the contrary, a spacious Horizon is an image of Liberty, where the eye has room to range abroad, to expatiate at large on the immensity of its views, and to lose it self amidst the variety of objects that offer themselves to its observation. Such wide and undetermined prospects are as pleasing to the fancy, as the speculations of Eternity or Infinitude are to the understanding. But if there be a beauty or uncommonness joined with this grandeur, as in a troubled ocean, a heaven adorned with stars and meteors, or a spacious landscape cut out into rivers, woods, rocks, and meadows, the pleasure still grows upon us, as it arises from more than a single principle.

Every thing that is new or uncommon raises a pleasure in the Imagination, because it fills the Soul with an agreeable surprize, gratifies its curiosity, and gives it an idea of which it was not before sensible. We are indeed so often conversant with one set of objects, and tired out with so many repeated views of the same things, that whatever is new or uncommon contributes a little to vary human life, and to divert our minds, for a while, with the strangeness of its appearance: it serves us for a kind of refreshment, and takes off from that satiety we are apt to complain of in our usual and ordinary entertainments. It is this that bestows charms on a monster, and makes even the imperfections of nature please us. It is this that recommends variety, where the mind is every instant called off to something new, and the attention not suffered to dwell too long, and waste it self on any particular object. It is this, likewise, that improves what is great or beautiful, and makes it afford the mind a double entertainment. Groves, fields, and meadows, are at any season of the year pleasant to look upon, but never so much as in the opening of the spring, when they are all new and fresh, with their first gloss upon them, and not yet too much accustomed and familiar to the eye. For this reason there is nothing that more enlivens a prospect than rivers, jetteaus, or falls of water, where the scene is perpetually shifting, and entertaining the light every moment with something that is new. We are quickly tired with looking upon hills and valleys, where every thing continues fixed and settled in the same place and posture, but find our thoughts a little agitated.
ried and relieved at the sight of such objects as are ever in motion, and flying away from beneath the eye of the beholder.
But there is nothing that makes its way more directly to the Soul than Beauty, which immediately diffuses a secret satisfaction and complacency through the imagination, and gives a finishing to any thing that is great or uncommon. The very first discovery of it strikes the mind with an inward joy, and spreads a cheerfulnes and delight through all its faculties.
There is not perhaps any real beauty or deformity more in one piece of matter than another, because we might have been so made, that whatsoever now appears loathsome to us, might have shewn itself agreeable; but we find by experience, that there are several modifications of matter, which the mind, without any previous consideration, pronounces at first sight beautiful or deformed. Thus we see that every different species of tender creatures has its different notions of beauty, and that each of them is most affected with the beauties of its own kind. This is no where more remarkable than in birds of the same shape and proportion, where we often see the male determined in his courtship by the single grain or tincture of a feather, and never discovering any charms but in the colour of its species.

Sciit thalamo servare fidem, sanctaque veret
Communii leges, non illum in pectore candor
Solicitat nervus; neque pravum accendit amore
Splendida lauus, vel honesta in vertice crista,
Porpureaque nitor pennarum; ait agmina latè
Faminea explorat cantus, maculisque requirit
Cognatas, paribusque interilia corpora guttis:
Ni faceret, pictis sylvis circum andaque modestis
Confusam aspiceres usque, partusque bisormes,
Et genus ambiguum, et Venere monumenta nefanda.
Hinc merula in nigro se oblectat nigra marito,
Hinc jocosum lasciva petit Philomela canorum,
Agnoscitque pares fonsitus, hinc noitua tetram
Canitium alarum, et glanosis miratur ocellos.
Nempe fbi tempore conflit, cresetque quas annus
Lucida progenies, cafas confessa parentes;
Dam virides inter falsus lucasque sonoros
Vere novo exultas, plumaque decora juventus
Explicit ad solem, patrisque coloribus ardet.

Q992 There
There is a second kind of Beauty that we find in the several products of Art and Nature, which does not work in the imagination with that warmth and violence as the beauty that appears in our proper species, but is apt however to raise in us a secret delight, and a kind of fondness for the places or objects in which we discover it. This consists either in the gaiety or variety of colours, in the symmetry and proportion of parts, in the arrangement and disposition of bodies, or in a just mixture and concurrence of all together. Among these kinds of beauty the eye takes most delight in colours. We nowhere meet with a more glorious or pleasing show in nature, than what appears in the Heavens at the rising and setting of the Sun, which is wholly made up of those different tints of light that shew themselves in clouds of a different situation. For this reason we find the Poets, who are always addressing themselves to the imagination, borrowing more of their epithets from colours than from any other topic.

As the fancy delights in every thing that is great, strange, or beautiful, and is still more pleased the more it finds of these perfections in the same object, so is it capable of receiving new satisfaction by the allusion of another sense. Thus any continued sound, as the music of birds, or a fall of water, awakens every moment the mind of the beholder, and makes him more attentive to the several beauties of the place that lye before him. Thus if there arise a fragrancy of smells or perfumes, they heighten the pleasures of the imagination, and make even the colours and verdure of the Landscape appear more agreeable; for the ideas of both senses recommend each other, and are pleasanter together than when they enter the mind separately: as the different colours of a picture, when they are well disposed, set off one another, and receive an additional beauty from the advantage of their situation.
THOUGH in yesterday's paper we considered how every thing that is Great, New, or Beautiful, is apt to affect the imagination with pleasure, we must own that it is impossible for us to assign the necessary cause of this pleasure, because we know neither the nature of an Idea, nor the substance of an human Soul, which might help us to discover the conformity or disagreeableness of the one to the other: and therefore, for want of such a light, all that we can do in speculations of this kind, is to reflect on those operations of the Soul that are most agreeable, and to range, under their proper heads, what is pleasing or displeasing to the mind, without being able to trace out the several necessary and efficient causes from whence the pleasure or displeasure arises.

Final Causes lie more bare and open to our observation, as there are often a greater variety that belong to the same effect; and these, though they are not altogether so satisfactory, are generally more useful than the other, as they give us greater occasion of admiring the goodness and wisdom of the first contriver.

One of the final causes of our delight, in any thing that is great, may be this. The supreme Author of our Being has so formed the Soul of man, that nothing but himself can be its last, adequate, and proper happiness. Because, therefore, a great part of our happiness must arise from the contemplation of his being, that he might give our Souls a just relish of such a contemplation, he has made them naturally delight in the apprehension of what is great or unlimited. Our admiration, which is a very pleasing motion of the mind, immediately rises at the consideration of any object that takes up a great deal of room in the fancy, and, by consequence, will improve into the highest pitch of astonishment and devotion when we contemplate his nature, that is neither circumcised by...
by time nor place, nor to be comprehended by the largest capacity of a created Being.

He has annexed a secret pleasure to the idea of any thing that is new or uncommon, that he might encourage us in the pursuit after knowledge, and engage us to search into the wonders of his creation; for every new idea brings such a pleasure along with it, as rewards any pains we have taken in its acquisition, and consequently serves as a motive to put us upon fresh discoveries.

He has made every thing that is beautiful in our own species pleasant, that all creatures might be tempted to multiply their kind, and fill the world with inhabitants; for it is very remarkable that where-ever nature is crost in the production of a monster (the result of any unnatural mixture) the breed is incapable of propagating its likeness, and of founding a new order of creatures; so that unless all animals were allure by the beauty of their own species, generation would be at an end, and the earth unpeopled.

In the last place, he has made every thing that is beautiful in all other objects pleasant, or rather has made so many objects appear beautiful, that he might render the whole Creation more gay and delightful. He has given almost every thing about us the power of raising an agreeable idea in the imagination: so that it is impossible for us to behold his works with coldness or indifference, and to survey so many beauties without a secret satisfaction and complacency. Things would make but a poor appearance to the eye, if we saw them only in their proper figures and motions: and what reason can we assign for their exciting us so many of those ideas which are different from any thing that exists in the objects themselves, (for such are light and colours) were not it to add supernumerary ornaments to the universe, and make it more agreeable to the imagination? We are every where entertained with pleasing shows and apparitions, we discover imaginary glories in the heavens, and in the earth, and see some of this visionary beauty poured out upon the whole Creation; but what a rough unsightly sketch of nature should we be entertained with, did all her colouring disappear, and the several distinctions of light and shade vanish? In short, our Souls are at present delightfully lost and bewildered in a pleasing delusion, and we walk about like the enchanted Hero of a Romance, who sees beautiful castles, woods and meadows; and at the same time hears the warbling of birds, and the purring of streams; but upon the finishing of some secret spell, the fantastick scene breaks up, and the disconfortate Knight finds himself on a barren heath, heath, or in a solitary defart. It is not improbable that something like this may be the state of the Soul after its first separation, in respect of the images it will receive from matter, though indeed the ideas of colours are so pleasing and beautiful in the imagination, that it is possible the Soul will not be deprived of them, but perhaps find them excited by some other occasional cause, as they are at present by the different impressions of the subtle matter on the organ of sight.

I have here supposed that my Reader is acquainted with that great modern discovery, which is at present universally acknowledged by all the enquirers into natural Philosophy: namely, that light and colours, as apprehended by the imagination, are only ideas in the mind, and not qualities that have any existence in matter. As this is a truth which has been proved incontestably by many modern Philosophers, and is indeed one of the finest speculations in that science, if the English reader would see the notion explained at large, he may find it in the eighth chapter of the second book of Mr. Locke's Essay on Human Understanding.

№ 414. Wednesday, June 25.

------- Alterius sic

Altera poscet opem res et conjurat amici. Hor.

If we consider the works of Nature and Art, as they are qualified to entertain the imagination, we shall find the last very defective, in comparison of the former; for though they may sometimes appear as beautiful or strange, they can have nothing in them of that vastness and immensity, which afford so great an entertainment to the mind of the beholder. The one may be as polite and delicate as the other, but can never shew her self to augment and magnificence in the design. There is something more bold and masterly in the rough careless strokes of Nature, than in the nice touches and embellishments of Art. The beauties of the most flatly garden or palace lie in a narrow compass; the imagination immediately runs them over, and requires something else to gratifie her; but, in the wide fields of Nature, the sight wanders up and down without out confinement, and is fed with an infinite variety of images, without any certain limit or number. For this reason we always find the Poet in love with a country-life, where nature appears in the greatest perfection, and furnishes out those scenes that are most apt to delight the imagination.

Scriptorium chorus omnium amat annum, et fugit urbes. Hor.

Hic sequa quies, et nescia fallere vita,

Divus opus variarum; hic latis otia fundis,

Spenaeus, vivique latus, hic frigida Tempe,

Mugitusque boun, melosque sub arbore somni. Virg.

But though there are several of these wild scenes, that are more delightful than any artificial shows; yet we find the works of nature still more pleasant, the more they resemble those of art: for in this case our pleasure rises from a double principle; from the agreeableness of the objects to the eye, and from their similitude to other objects: we are pleased as well with comparing their beauties, as with surveying them, and can represent them to our minds, either as copies or originals. Hence it is that we take delight in a prospect which is well laid out, and diversified with fields and meadows; woods and rivers; in those accidental landscapes of trees, clouds and cities, that are sometimes found in the veins of marble; in the curious fret-work of rocks, and grottos; and, in a word, in any thing that hath such a variety or regularity as may seem the effect of design, in what we call the works of Chance.

If the products of nature rise in value, according as they more or less resemble those of art, we may be sure that artificial works receive a greater advantage from their resemblance of such as are natural; because here the similitude is not only pleasant, but the pattern more perfect. The prettiest landscape I ever saw, was one drawn on the walls of a dark room, which flood opposite on one side to a navigable river, and on the other to a park. The experiment is very common in optics. Here you might discover the waves and fluctuations of the water in strong and proper colours, with the picture of a ship entering at one end, and sailing by degrees through the whole piece. On another there appeared the green shadows of trees, waving to and fro with the wind, and herds of Deer among them in miniature, leaping about upon the wall. I must confess, the Novelty of such a Sight may be one occasion of its pleasantness to the imagination, but certainly the chief reason is its near resemblance to nature, ture, as it does not only, like other pictures, give the colour and figure, but the motion of the things it represents.

We have before observed, that there is generally in nature something more grand and august, than what we meet with in the curiosities of art. When, therefore, we see this imitated in any measure, it gives us a nobler and more exalted kind of pleasure than what we receive from the nicer and more accurate productions of art. On this account our English gardens are not so entertaining to the fancy as those in France and Italy, where we see a large extent of ground covered over with an agreeable mixture of garden and forest, which represent every where an artificial rudeness, much more charming than that neatness and elegance which we meet with in those of our own country. It might, indeed, be of ill consequence to the public, as well as unprofitable to private persons, to alienate so much ground from pasturage, and the plow, in many parts of a country that is so well peopled, and cultivated to a far greater advantage. But why may not a whole estate be thrown into a kind of garden by frequent plantations, that may turn as much to the profit, as the pleasure of the owner? A marsh overgrown with willows, or a mountain shaded with oaks, are not only more beautiful, but more beneficial, than when they lie bare and unadorned. Fields of corn make a pleasant prospect, and if the walks were a little taken care of that lie between them, if the natural embroidery of the meadows were helped and improved by some small additions of art, and the several rows of hedges set off by trees and flowers, that the soil was capable of receiving, a man might make a pretty landskip of his own possession.

Writers, who have given us an account of China, tell us, the inhabitants of that country laugh at the plantations of our Europeans, which are laid out by the rule and line; because, they say, any one may place trees in equal rows and uniform figures. They chuse rather to shew a genius in works of this nature, and therefore always conceal the art by which they direct themselves. They have a word, it seems, in their language, by which they express the particular beauty of a plantation that thus strikes the imagination at first sight, without discovering what it is that has so agreeable an effect. Our British Gardeners, on the contrary, instead of humouring nature, love to deviate from it as much as possible. Our trees rise in cones, globes, and pyramids. We see the marks of the scissars upon every plant and bush. I do not know whether I am singular in my opinion, but, for my own part, I would rather look upon a tree in all its luxuriancy and diffuseness of boughs and branches, than when... it is thus cut and trimmed into a mathematical figure; and cannot but fancy that an orchard in flower looks infinitely more delightful, than all the little labyrinths of the most finished Parterre. But as our great Moddellers of gardens have their magazines of plants to dipole of; it is very natural for them to rear up all the beautiful plantations of fruit trees, and contrive a plan that may most turn to their own profit, in taking off their Evergreens, and the like moveable plants, with which their shops are plentifully stocked.

HR"415. Thursday, June 26.

Adde tot egregias urbes, operumque laborem: Virg.

HAVING already shewn how the Fancy is affected by the works of nature, and afterwards considered in general both the works of nature and of art, how they mutually assist and compleat each other, in forming such scenes and prospects as are most apt to delight the mind of the beholder, I shall in this paper throw together some reflections on that particular art, which has a more immediate tendency, than any other, to produce those primary pleasures of the Imagination, which have hitherto been the subject of this discourse. The art I mean is that of Architecture, which I shall consider only with regard to the light in which the foregoing Speculations have placed it, without entering into those rules and maxims which the great masters of Architecture have laid down, and explained at large in numberless treatises upon that subject.

Greatness, in the works of Architecture, may be considered as relating to the bulk and body of the structure, or to the Manner in which it is built. As for the first, we find the antients, especially among the eastern nations of the world, infinitely superior to the moderns.

Not to mention the Tower of Babel, of which an old Author says, there were the foundations to be seen in his time, which looked like a spacious mountain; what could be more noble than the walls of Babylon, its hanging gardens, and its temple to Jupiter Belus, that rose a mile high by eight several stories, each story a furlong in height, and on
the
the top of which was the Babylonian observatory? I might here, likewise, take notice of the huge rock that was cut into the figure of Semiramis, with the smaller rocks that lay by it in the shape of tributary Kings; the prodigious basin, or artificial lake, which took in the whole Euphrates, until such time as a new canal was formed for its reception, with the several trenches through which that river was conveyed. I know there are perfons who look upon some of these wonders of art as fabulous, but I cannot find any grounds for such a suspicion, unless it be that we have no such works among us at present. There were indeed many greater advantages for building in those times, and in that part of the world, than have been met with ever since. The earth was extremely fruitful, men lived generally on pasture, which requires a much smaller number of hands than Agriculture: there were few trades to employ the busy part of mankind, and fewer arts and sciences to give work to men of speculative tempers; and what is more than all the rest, the Prince was absolute; so that when he went to war, he put himself at the head of a whole people: as we find Semiramis leading her three millions to the field, and yet overpowered by the number of her enemies. It is no wonder, therefore, when she was at peace, and turned her thoughts on building, that she could accomplish so great works, with such a prodigious multitude of labourers: besides that, in her climate, there was small interruption of frosts and winters, which make the northern workmen lye half the year idle. I might mention too, among the benefits of the climate, what Historians say of the earth, that it sweated out a bitumen or natural kind of mortar, which is doubtless the same with that mentioned in holy writ, as contributing to the structure of Babel. Slime they used instead of mortar.

In Egypt we still see their Pyramids, which answer to the descriptions that have been made of them; and I question not but a Traveller might find out some remains of the Labyrinth that covered a whole province, and had a hundred temples dispofed among its several quarters and divisions.

The wall of China is one of these eastern pieces of magnificence, which makes a figure even in the map of the world, although an account of it would have been thought fabulous, were not the wall itself still extant.

We are obliged to devotion for the noblest buildings that have adorned the several countries of the world. It is this which has set men at work on temples and publick places of worship, not only that they might, by the magnificence of the building, invite the Deity to reside within within it, but that such stupendous works might, at the same time, open the mind to vast conceptions, and fit it to converse with the Divinity of the place. For every thing that is majestic, imprimes an awfulness and reverence on the mind of the beholder, and strikes in with the natural greatness of the soul.

In the second place we are to consider Greatness of Manner in Architecture, which has such force upon the imagination, that a small building, where it appears, shall give the mind nobler ideas than one of twenty times the bulk, where the Manner is ordinary or little. Thus, perhaps, a man would have been more astonished with the majestic air that appeared in one of Lysippus's Statues of Alexander, though no bigger than the Life, than he might have been with mount Abos, had it been cut into the figure of the Heroe, according to the proposal of Phidias, with a river in one hand, and a city in the other.

Let any one reflect on the disposition of mind he finds in himself, at his first entrance into the Pantheon at Rome, and how his imagination is filled with something great and amazing; and, at the same time, consider how little, in proportion, he is affected with the inside of a Gothic Cathedral, though it be five times larger than the other; which can arise from nothing else, but the greatness of the Manner in the one, and the meanness in the other.

I have seen an observation upon this subject in a French Author, which very much pleased me. It is in Monsieur Freart's Parallel of the ancient and modern Architecture. I shall give it to the Reader with the same terms of art which he has made use of. I am observing (says he) a thing which, in my opinion, is very curious, whence it proceeds, that in the same quantity of superficies, the one manner seems great and magnificent, and the other poor and trifling; the reason is fine and uncommon. I say then, that to introduce into Architecture this grandeur of manner, we ought so to proceed, that the division of the principal members of the Order may consist but of few parts, that they be all great and of a bold and ample Relief, and Swelling; and that the eye, beholding nothing little and mean, the imagination may be more vigorously touched and affected with the work that stands before it. For example: in a Corinnes, if the Gola or Cynatium of the Corona, the Coping, the Modillions or Dentelli, make a noble show by their graceful projections, if we see none of that ordinary confusion which is the result of those little Cavities, quarter rounds of the Asfopal, and I know not how many other intermingled particulars, which produce no effect in great and massy works, and
and which very unprofitably take up place to the prejudice of the principal member, it is most certain that this manner will appear solemn and great; as on the contrary, that will have but a poor and mean effect, where there is a redundancy of those smaller ornaments, which divide and scatter the angles of the light into such a multitude of rays, so press'd together that the whole will appear but a confusion.

Among all the figures in Architecture, there are none that have a greater air than the Concave and the Convex; and we find in all the ancient and modern Architecture, as well in the remote parts of China, as in countries nearer home, that round pillars and vaulted roofs make a great part of those buildings which are designed for pomp and magnificence. The reason I take to be, because in these figures we generally see more of the body, than in those of other kinds. There are, indeed, figures of bodies, where the eye may take in two thirds of the surface; but as in such bodies the light must split upon several angles, it does not take in one uniform idea, but several ideas of the same kind. Look upon the outside of a Dome, your eye half surrounds it; look up into the inside, and at one glance you have all the prospect of it; the entire convexity falls into your eye at once, the light being as the center that collects and gathers into it the lines of the whole circumference: in a square pillar, the light often takes in but a fourth part of the surface, and if a square concave, must move up and down to the different sides, before it is master of all the inward surface. For this reason, the Fancy is infinitely more struck with the view of the open air, and skie, that passes through an arch, than what comes through a square, or any other figure. The figure of the Rainbow does not contribute less to its magnificence, than the colours to its beauty, as it is very poetically described by the son of Sirach: Look upon the Rainbow, and praise him that made it; very beautiful it is in its brightness; it encompasses the heavens with a glorious circle, and the bands of the most High have bended it.

Having thus spoken of that Greatness which affects the mind in Architecture, I might next shew the pleasure that rises in the imagination from what appears new and beautiful in this art; but as every beholder has naturally a greater taste of these two perfections in every building which offers it first to his view, than of that which I have hitherto considered, I shall not trouble my Reader with any reflections upon it. It is sufficient for my present purpose, to observe, that there is nothing in this whole Art which pleases the imagination, but as it is great, uncommon, or beautiful.
At first divided the pleasures of the imagination, into such as arise from objects that are actually before our eyes, or that once entered in at our eyes, and are afterwards called up into the mind either barely by its own operations, or on occasion of something without us, as statues or descriptions. We have already considered the first division, and shall therefore enter on the other, which, for distinction sake, I have called the secondary pleasures of the imagination. When I say the ideas we receive from statues, descriptions, or such like occasions, are the same that were once actually in our view, it must not be understood that we had once seen the very place, action, or person which are carved or described. It is sufficient, that we have seen places, persons, or actions, in general, which bear a resemblance, or at least some remote analogy with what we find represented. Since it is in the power of the imagination, when it is once stocked with particular ideas, to enlarge, compound, and vary them at her own pleasure.

Among the different kinds of representation, Statuary is the most natural, and shews us something likest the object that is represented. To make use of a common instance, let one who is born blind take an image in his hands, and trace out with his fingers the different furrows and impressions of the chisel, and he will easily conceive how the shape of a man, or beast, may be represented by it; but should he draw his hand over a Picture, where all is smooth and uniform, he would never be able to imagine how the several prominencies and depressions of a human body could be shown on a plain piece of canvas, that has in it no unevenness or irregularity. Description runs yet further from the things it represents than Painting; for a picture bears a real resemblance to its original, which letters and syllables are wholly void of. Colours speak all languages, but words are understood only by such a people or nation. For this reason, though mens necessitites quickly put them on finding out speech. Writing is probably of a later invention than Painting; particularly we are told, that in America when the Spaniards first arrived there, expresss were sent to the Emperor of Mexico in Paint, and the news of his country delineated by the strokes of a pencil, which was a more natural way than that of writing, though at the same time much more imperfect, because it is impossible to draw the little connexions of speech, or to give the picture of a conjunction or an adverb. It would be yet more strange, to represent visible objects by sounds that have no ideas annexed to them, and to make something like description in Music. Yet it is certain, there may be confused, imperfect notions of this nature raised in the imagination by an artificial composition of notes; and we find that great Masters in the art are able, sometimes, to set their hearers in the heat and hurry of a battle, to overcast their minds with melancholy scenes and apprehensions of deaths and funerals, or to fill them into pleasing dreams of groves and elyseums.

In all these instances, this secondary pleasure of the Imagination proceeds from that action of the mind, which compares the ideas arising from the original objects, with the ideas we receive from the statue, picture, description, or sound that represents them. It is impossible for us to give the necessary reason, why this operation of the mind is attended with so much pleasure, as I have before observed on the same occasion; but we find a great variety of entertainments derived from this single principle: for it is this that not only gives us a relish of Statuary, painting and description, but makes us delight in all the actions and arts of mimicry. It is this that makes the several kinds of wit pleasing, which consists, as I have formerly shewn, in the affinity of ideas: and we may add, it is this also that raises the little satisfaction we sometimes find in the different sorts of false wit; whether it consists in the affinity of letters, as in Anagram, Acrostick; or of syllables, as in Doggerel rhymes, Echoes; or of words, as in Puns, Quibbles; or of a whole sentence or Poem, to Wings, and Altars. The final Cause, probably, of annexing pleasure to this operation of the mind, was to quicken and encourage us in our searches after truth, since the distinguishing one thing from another, and the right discerning betwixt our ideas, depends wholly upon our comparing them together, and observing the congruity or disagreement that appears among the several works of Nature.

But I shall here confine my self to those pleasures of the Imagination, which proceed from ideas raised by words, because most of the observations that agree with descriptions, are equally applicable to Painting and Statuary.
Words, when well chosen, have so great a force in them, that a description often gives us more lively ideas than the sight of things themselves. The Reader finds a scene drawn in stronger colours, and painted more to the life in his imagination, by the help of words, than by an actual survey of the scene which they describe. In this case, the Poet seems to get the better of Nature; he takes, indeed, the Lanskip after her, but gives it more vigorous touches, heightens its beauty, and so en-livens the whole piece, that the images which flow from the objects themselves appear weak and faint, in comparison of those that come from the expressions. The reason, probably, may be, because in the survey of any object we have only so much of it painted on the Imagination, as comes in at the eye; but in its description, the Poet gives us a free a view of it as he pleases, and discovers to us several parts, that either we did not attend to, or that lay out of our sight when we first beheld it.
As we look on any object, our idea of it is, perhaps, made up of two or three simple ideas; but when the Poet represents it, he may either give us a more complex idea of it, or only raise in us such ideas as are most apt to affect the Imagination.

It may be here worth our while to examine how it comes to pass that several readers, who are all acquainted with the same language, and know the meaning of the words they read, should nevertheless have a different refine of the same descriptions. We find one transported with a passion, which another runs over with coldness and indifference, or finding the representation extremely natural, where another can perceive nothing of likeliness and conformity. This different taste must proceed, either from the perfection of Imagination in one more than another, or from the difcerent ideas that several Readers affix to the same words. For, to have a true relish, and form a right judgment of a description, a man should be born with a good imagination, and must have well weighed the force and energy that lies in the several words of a language, so as to be able to distinguish which are most significant and expressive of their proper ideas, and what additional strength and beauty they are capable of receiving from conjunction with others. The fancy must be warm, to retain the print of those images it hath received from outward objects; and the judgment discerning, to know what expressions are most proper to cloath and adorn them to the best advantage. A man who is deficient in either of these respects, though he may receive the general notion of a description, can never see distinctly all its particular beauties: as a person, with a weak sight, may have the confused prospect of a place that lies
We may observe, that any single circumstance of what we have formerly seen, often raises up a whole scene of imagery, and awakens numberless Ideas that before slept in the Imagination; such a particular smell or colour is able to fill the mind, on a sudden, with the picture of the fields or gardens where we first met with it, and to bring up into view all the variety of images that once attended it. Our Imagination takes the hint, and leads us unexpectedly into cities or theatres, plains or meadows. We may further observe, when the fancy thus reflects on the scenes that have past in it formerly, those which were at first pleasant to behold, appear more to upon reflection, and that the memory heightens the delightfulness of the original. A Cartesian would account for both these instances in the following manner.

The set of ideas, which we received from such a prospect or garden, having entered the mind at the same time, have a set of traces belonging to them in the brain, bordering very near upon one another; when therefore any one of these ideas arises in the Imagination, and consequently dispatches a flow of animal spirits to its proper trace, these spirits, in the violence of their motion, run not only into the trace, to which they were more particularly directed, but into several of those that lie about it: by this means they awaken other ideas of the same set, which immediately determine determine a new dispatch of spirits, that in the same manner open other neighbouring traces, till at last the whole fett of them is blown up, and the whole prospect or garden flourishes in the imagination. But becaufe the pleafure we received from these places far furred mounted, and overcame the disagreeablenefs we found in them, for this reafon there was at firt a wider paffage worn in the pleafure traces, and, on the contrary, fo narrow a one in thofe which belonged to the disagreeable ideas, that they were quickly ftopt up, and rendered incapable of receiving any animal spirits, and consequently of exciting any unpleafant ideas in the memory.

It would be in vain to enquire, whether the power of imagining things strongly proceeds from any greater perfection in the Soul, or from any nicer texture in the brain of one man than of another. But this is certain, that a noble writer fhould be born with this faculty in its fulflrength and vigour, fo as to be able to receive lively ideas from outward objects, to retain them long, and to range them together, upon occasion, in fuch figures and representations as are most likely to hit the fancy of the reader. A Poet fhould take as much pains in forming his imagination, as a Philofopher in cultivating his understanding. He muft gain a due relifh of the works of nature, and be thoroughly converfant in the various fce-nary of a country life.

When he is flored with country images, if he would go beyond paflor, and the lower kinds of poetry, he ought to acquaint himfelf with the pomp and magnificence of Courts. He fhould be very well verfed in every thing that is noble and ftrately in the productions of art, whether it appear in Painting or Statuary, in the great works of Architecture which are in their prefent glory, or in the ruins of thofe which flourifhcd in former ages.

Such advantages as these help to open a man's thoughts, and to enlarge his imagination, and will therefore have their influence on all kinds of writing, if the Author knows how to make right ufe of them. And among thofe of the learned languages who excel in this talent, the moft perfect in their feveral kinds, are perhaps Homer, Virgil, and Ovid. The first strikes the imagination wonderfully with what is Great, the fecond with what is Beautiful, and the laft with what is Strange. Reading the Iliad is like travelling through a country uninhabited, where the fancy is entertained with a thoufand favage prospects of vaft defarts, wide uncultivated marshes, huge forests, mif-shapen rocks and precipices. On the contrary, the Aeneid is like a well ordered garden, where it is im-pofible to find out any part unadorned, or to call our eyes upon a fingle spot;
spot, that does not produce some beautiful plant or flower. But when we are in the Metamorphosis, we are walking on enchanted ground, and see nothing but scenes of Magick lying round us.

Homer is in his province, when he is describing a battle or a multitude, a Heroe or a God. Virgil is never better pleased, than when he is in Elysium, or copying out an entertaining picture. Homer's epithets generally mark out what is Great, Virgil's what is Agreeable. Nothing can be more Magnificent than the figure Jupiter makes in the first Iliad, nor more Charming than that of Venus in the first Aeneid.

H, quæ reclusa in* v. *erat ubi KagisioAmbrosia d' ąre cætera et penitus æque ià, Kagisio ap' ad amatores migav d' inilium cæleptum.

Dixit, et avites volat servis servatum: Ambrosia quem divinum vertice odor emSpiravere: pedes vestis defluet ad immos:Et vera insitus patuit Dea——

Homer's persons are most of them god-like and terrible; Virgil has scarce admitted any into his Poem, who are not beautiful, and has taken particular care to make his Hero so.

——lumenque juventaePurpureum, et latus oculis afflavit honores.

In a word, Homer fills his Readers with sublime ideas, and, I believe, has raised the imagination of all the good Poets that have come after him. I shall only instance Horace, who immediately takes fire at the first hint of any passage in the Iliad or Odyssey, and always rises above himself, when he has Homer in his view. Virgil has drawn together, into his Aeneid, all the pleasing scenes his subject is capable of admitting, and in his Georgics has given us a collection of the most delightful Landscapes that can be made out of fields and woods, herds of cattle, and swarms of bees.

Ovid, in his Metamorphosis, has shewn us how the Imagination may be affected by what is Strange. He describes a miracle in every Story, and always gives us the sight of some new creature at the end of it. His art consists chiefly in well-timing his description, before the first shape is quite worn off, and the new one perfectly finished; so that he every where entertains us with something we never saw before, and shews Monster after Monster, to the end of the Metamorphosis.
If I were to name a Poet that is a perfect Master in all these arts of working on the Imagination, I think Milton may pass for one: and if his Paradise Lost falls short of the Aeneid or Iliad in this respect, it proceeds rather from the fault of the language in which it is written, than from any defect of genius in the Author. So divine a Poem in English, is like a stately Palace built of brick, where one may see Architecture in as great a perfection as in one of marble, though the materials are of a coarser nature. But to consider it only as it regards our present subject: what can be conceived greater than the battle of Angels, the Majesty of Messiah, the nature and behaviour of Satan and his peers? What more beautiful than Pandemonium, Paradise, Heaven, Angels, Adam and Eve? What more strange, than the Creation of the world, the several Metamorphoses of the fallen Angels, and the surprizing adventures their leader meets with in his search after Paradise? No other subject could have furnished a Poet with scenes so proper to strike the Imagination, as no other Poet could have painted those scenes in more strong and lively colours.

Sed et rubus asper amorum. Virg.

The pleasures of these secondary views of the Imagination, are of a wider and more universal nature than those it has when joined with sight; for not only what is great, strange or beautiful, but anything that is disagreeable when looked upon, pleases us, in an apt description. Here, therefore, we must enquire after a new principle of pleasure, which is nothing else but the action of the mind, which compares the Ideas that arise from words, with the Ideas that arise from the objects themselves; and why this operation of the mind is attended with so much pleasure, we have before considered. For this reason therefore, the description of a dung-hill is pleasing to the Imagination, if the image be presented to our minds by suitable expressions; though perhaps, this may be more properly called the pleasure of the understanding than of the fancy, because we are not so much delighted with the image that is contained in the description, as with the aptness of the description to excite the image. But
But if the description of what is little, common or deformed, be acceptable to the imagination, the description of what is great, surprising or beautiful, is much more so; because here we are not only delighted with comparing the representation with the original, but are highly pleased with the original itself. Most Readers, I believe, are more charmed with Milton's description of Paradise, than of Hell; they are both, perhaps, equally perfect in their kind, but in the one the brimstone and sulphur are not so refreshing to the imagination, as the beds of flowers and the wilderms of sweets in the other.

There is yet another circumstance which recommends a description more than all the rest, and that is if it represents to us such objects as are apt to raise a secret ferment in the mind of the Reader, and to work, with violence, upon his passions. For, in this case, we are at once warmed and enlightened, so that the Pleasure becomes more universal, and is several ways qualified to entertain us. Thus, in Painting, it is pleasant to look on the picture of any face, where the resemblance is hit, but the pleasure encreases, if it be the picture of a face that is beautiful, and is still greater, if the beauty be softened with an air of melancholy or sorrow. The two leading passions which the more serious parts of Poetry endeavour to stir up in us, are Terror and Pity. And here, by the way, one would wonder how it comes to pass, that such passions as are very unpleasant at all other times, are very agreeable when excited by proper descriptions. It is not strange, that we should take delight in such passages as are apt to produce Hope, Joy, Admiration, Love, or the like emotions in us, because they never rise in the mind without an inward pleasure which attends them. But how comes it to pass, that we should take delight in being terrified or dejected by a description, when we find so much uneasiness in the fear or grief which we receive from any other occasion?

If we consider, therefore, the nature of this pleasure, we shall find that it does not arise so properly from the description of what is terrible, as from the reflection we make on our selves at the time of reading it. When we look on such hideous objects, we are not a little pleased to think we are in no danger of them. We consider them at the same time, as dreadful and harmless; so that the more frightful appearance they make, the greater is the pleasure we receive from the sense of our own safety. In short, we look upon the terrors of a description, with the same curiosity and satisfaction that we survey a dead monster.

--- Informe
It is for the same reason that we are delighted with the reflecting upon dangers that are past, or in looking on a precipice at a distance, which would fill us with a different kind of horror, if we saw it hanging over our heads.

In the like manner, when we read of torments, wounds, deaths, and like dismal accidents, our pleasure does not flow so properly from the grief which such melancholy descriptions give us, as from the secret comparison which we make between our selves and the person who suffers. Such representations teach us to set a just value upon our own condition, and make us prize our good fortune which exempts us from the like calamities. This is, however, such a kind of pleasure as we are not capable of receiving, when we see a person actually lying under the tortures that we meet with in a description; because, in this case, the object presses too close upon our senses, and bears so hard upon us, that it does not give us time or leisure to reflect on our selves. Our thoughts are so intent upon the miseries of the sufferer, that we cannot turn them upon our own happiness. Whereas, on the contrary, we consider the misfortunes we read in history or poetry, either as past, or as fictitious, so that the reflection upon our selves rises in us insensibly, and over-bears the sorrow we conceive for the sufferings of the afflicted.

But because the mind of man requires something more perfect in matter, than what it finds there, and can never meet with any thing in nature which sufficiently answers its highest ideas of pleasantness; or, in other words, because the imagination can fancy to itself things more great, strange, or beautiful, than the eye ever saw, and is still sensible of some defect in what it has seen; on this account it is the part of a Poet to humour the imagination in its own notions, by mending and perfecting nature where he describes a reality, and by adding greater beauties than are put together in nature, where he describes a fiction.

He is not obliged to attend her in the slow advances which she makes from one season to another, or to observe her conduct, in the successive production of plants and flowers. He may draw into his description all the beauties of the spring and autumn, and make the whole year contribute something to render it the more agreeable. His rose-trees, wood-bines, and jessamines, may flower together, and his beds be covered at the same time with lilies, violets, and amaranths. His soil is not restrained to any particular sort of plants, but is proper either for oaks or myrtles, and adapts it self to the products of every climate. Oranges may grow wild in it; myrrh may be met with in every hedge, and if he thinks it proper to have a grove of spices, he can quickly command Sunough to raise it. If all this will not furnish out an agreeable scene, he can make several new species of flowers, with richer scents and higher colours, than any that grow in the gardens of nature. His confrons of birds may be as full and harmonious, and his woods as thick and gloomy as he pleases. He is at no more expense in a long vista, than a short one, and can as easily throw his cascades from a precipice of half a mile high, as from one of twenty yards. He has his choice of the winds, and can turn the course of his rivers in all the variety of Meanders, that are most delightful to the Reader's imagination. In a word, he has the modelling of nature in his own hands, and may give her what charms he pleases, provided he does not reform her too much, and run into absurdities, by endeavouring to excel.

N° 419. Tuesday, July 1.

---mentis gratissimus Error. Hor.

THERE is a kind of writing, wherein the Poet quite loses sight of nature, and entertains his Reader's imagination with the characters and actions of such persons as have many of them no existence, but what he fashions on them. Such are fairies, witches, magcians, demons, and departed spirits. This Mr. Dryden calls the Fairy:
way of writing, which is, indeed, more difficult than any other that depends on the Poet's fancy, because he has no pattern to follow in it, and must work altogether out of his own invention.

There is a very odd turn of thought required for this sort of writing, and it is impossible for a Poet to succeed in it, who has not a particular cast of fancy, an imagination naturally fruitful and superstitious. Befides,
this,
this, he ought to be very well versed in Legends and Fables, antiquated Romances, and the traditions of nurses and old women, that he may fall in with our natural prejudices, and humour those notions which we have imbibed in our infancy. For, otherwise, he will be apt to make his Fairies talk like people of his own species, and not like other fets of Beings, who converse with different objects, and think in a different manner from that of mankind;

*Sylvæ dédactæ cæværant, me judice, Panis
Ne velut inteat tropus ac pene forenses
Aut namum teneris juventutur versibus*—Hor.

I do not say with Mr. Bays in the Rehearsal, that Spirits must not be confined to speak sensibly, but it is certain their sense ought to be a little discoloured, that it may seem particular, and proper to the person and the condition of the speaker.

These descriptions raise a pleasing kind of horror in the mind of the Reader, and amuse his imagination with the strangeness and novelty of the persons who are represented in them. They bring up into our memory the stories we have heard in our childhood, and favour those secret terrors and apprehensions to which the mind of man is naturally subject.

We are pleased with surveying the different habits and behaviours of foreign countries, how much more must we be delighted and surprised when we are led, as it were, into a new creation, and see the persons and manners of another species? Men of cold fancies, and philosophical dispositions, object to this kind of poetry, that it has no probability enough to affect the imagination. But to this it may be answered, that we are sure, in general, there are many intellectual Beings in the world besides ourselves, and several species of spirits, who are subject to different laws and oeconomies from those of mankind; when we see, therefore, any of these represented naturally, we cannot look upon the representation as altogether impossible; nay, many are propofled with such false opinions, as disposses them to believe these particular delusions; at least, we have all heard so many pleasing relations in favour of them, that we do not care for seeing through the falsehood, and willingly give our selves up to so agreeable an imposition.

The Ancients have not much of this poetry among them; for, indeed, almost the whole substance of it owes its original to the darkness and superstition of later Ages, when pious frauds were made use of to amuse mankind, and frighten them into a sense of their duty. Our forefathers looked looked upon nature with more reverence and horour, before the world was enlightened by learning and philosophy, and loved to altonish themselves with the apprehensions of witchcraft, prodigies, charms and enchantments. There was not a village in England that had not a ghost in it, the Church-yards were all haunted, every large common had a circle of fairies belonging to it, and there was scarce a shepherd to be met with who had not seen a spirit.

Among all the Poets of this kind, our English are much the best, by what I have yet seen, whether it be that we abound with more stories of this nature, or that the genius of our country is fitter for this sort of poetry. For the English are naturally fanciful, and very often disposed by that gloominess and melancholy of temper, which is so frequent in our nation, to many wild notions and visions, to which others are not so liable.

Among the English, Shakespeare has incomparably excelled all others. That noble extravagance of fancy, which he had in so great perfection, thoroughly qualified him to touch this weak superstitious part of his Reader's imagination; and made him capable of succeeding, where he had nothing to support him besides the strength of his own genius. There is something so wild and yet so solemn in the speeches of his ghosts, fairies, witches, and the like imaginary persons, that we cannot forbear thinking them natural, though we have no rule by which to judge of them, and must confess, if there are such Beings in the world, it looks highly probable they should talk and act as he has represented them.

There is another sort of imaginary Beings, that we sometimes meet with among the Poets, when the Author represents any passion, appetite, virtue or vice, under a visible shape, and makes it a person or an actor in his Poem. Of this nature are the descriptions of Hunger and Envy in Ovid, of Fame in Virgil, and of Sin and Death in Milton. We find a whole creation of the like shadowy persons in Spencer, who had an admirable talent in representations of this kind. I have discoursed of these emblematical persons in former papers, and shall therefore only mention them in this place. Thus we see how many ways poetry addresses itself to the imagination, as it has not only the whole circle of nature for its province, but makes new worlds of its own, shews us persons who are not to be found in Being, and represents even the faculties of the soul, with her several virtues and vices, in a sensible shape and character.
As the writers in poetry and fiction borrow their several materials from outward objects, and join them together at their own pleasure, there are others who are obliged to follow nature more closely, and to take entire scenes out of her. Such are Historians, natural Philosophers, Travellers, Geographers, and in a word, all who describe visible objects of a real existence.

It is the most agreeable talent of a Historian, to be able to draw up his armies and fight his battles in proper expressions, to set before our eyes the divisions, cabals, and jealousies of great men, and to lead us step by step into the several actions and events of his history. We love to see the subject unfolding itself by just degrees, and breaking upon us insensibly, that so we may be kept in a pleasing suspense, and have time given us to raise our expectations, and to slide with one of the parties concerned in the relation. I confess this shews more the art than the veracity of the Historian, but I am only to speak of him as he is qualified to please the imagination. And in this respect Livy has, perhaps, excelled all who ever went before him, or have written since his time. He describes every thing in so lively a manner, that his whole history is an admirable picture, and touches on such proper circumstances in every story, that his Reader becomes a kind of spectator, and feels in himself all the variety of passions, which are correspondent to the several parts of the relation.

But among this sect of writers, there are none who more gratify and enlarge the imagination, than the Authors of the new philosophy, whether we consider their Theories of the earth or heavens, the discoveries they have made by glances, or any other of their contemplations on nature.
We are not a little pleased to find every green leaf swarm with millions of animals, that at their largest growth are not visible to the naked eye. There is something very engaging to the fancy, as well as to our reason, in the treatises of metals, minerals, plants and meteors. But when we survey the whole earth at once, and the several planets that lie within its neighbourhood, we are filled with a pleasing astonishment, to see so many worlds hanging one above another, and sliding round their axes in such an amazing pomp and solemnity. If, after this, we contemplate those wide fields of Aether, that reach in height as far as from Saturn to the fixed stars, and run abroad almost to an infinitude, our imagination finds its capacity filled with so immense a prospect, as puts it upon the stretch to comprehend it. But if we yet rise higher, and consider the fixed stars as so many vast oceans of flame, that are each of them attended with a different set of planets, and still discover new firmaments and new lights, that are sunk farther in those unfathomable depths of Aether, so as not to be seen by the strongest of our Telescopes, we are lost in such a labyrinth of suns and worlds, and confounded with the immensity and magnificence of Nature.

Nothing is more pleasant to the fancy, than to enlarge it still, by degrees, in its contemplation of the various proportions which its several objects bear to each other, when it compares the body of man to the bulk of the whole earth, the earth to the circle it describes round the Sun, that circle to the Sphere of the fixed stars, the Sphere of the fixed stars to the circuit of the whole Creation, the whole Creation itself to the infinite space that is everywhere diffused about it; or when the imagination works downward, and considers the bulk of a human body, in respect of an animal, a hundred times less than a mite, the particular limbs of such an animal, the different springs which actuate the limbs, the spirits which set them a going, and the proportionable minuteness of these several parts, before they have arrived at their full growth and perfection. But if, after all this, we take the least particle of these animal spirits, and consider its capacity of being wrought into a world, that shall contain within those narrow dimensions a heaven and earth, stars and planets, and every different species of living creatures, in the same analogy and proportion they bear to each other in our own universe; such a speculation, by reason of its nicety, appears ridiculous to those who have not turned their thoughts that way, though, at the same time, it is founded on no less than the evidence of a demonstration. Nay, we might yet carry it farther, and discover in the smallest particle of this little world, a new inexhausted fund of matter, capable of being spun out into another universe.
I have dwelt the longer on this subject, because I think it may shew us the proper limits, as well as the defectiveness of our Imagination; how it is confined to a very small quantity of space, and immediately flops in its operations, when it endeavours to take in any thing that is very great, or very little. Let a man try to conceive the different bulk of an animal, which is twenty, from another which is a hundred times less than a mite, or to compare, in his thoughts, a length of a thousand Diameters of the earth, with that of a million, and he will quickly find that he has no different measures in his mind, adjusted to such extraordinary degrees of grandeur or minuteness. The understanding, indeed, opens an infinite space on every side of us, but the Imagination, after a few faint efforts, is immediately at a stand, and finds her self swallowed up in the immensity of the void that surrounds it: our reason can pursue a particle of matter through an infinite variety of divisions, but the fancy soon loses sight of it, and feels in it self a kind of Chasm, that wants to be filled with matter of a more sensible bulk. We can neither widen, nor contract the faculty to the dimensions of either extreme: the object is too big for our capacity, when we would comprehend the circumference of a world, and dwindles into nothing, when we endeavour after the idea of an atome.

It is possible this defect of Imagination may not be in the Soul it self, but as it acts in conjunction with the body. Perhaps there may not be room in the brain for such a variety of impressions, or the animal spirits may be incapable of figuring them in such a manner, as is necessary to excite so very large or very minute ideas. However it be, we may well suppose that Beings of a higher nature very much excel us in this respect, as it is probable the Soul of man will be infinitely more perfect hereafter in this faculty, as well as in all the rest; inomuch that, perhaps, the imagination will be able to keep pace with the understanding, and to form in it self distinct ideas of all the different modes and quantities of space.
The pleasures of the Imagination are not wholly confined to such particular Authors as are conversant in material objects, but are often to be met with among the polite Masters of morality, criticism, and other speculations abstracted from matter, who, though they do not directly treat of the visible parts of nature, often draw from their similitudes, metaphors, and allegories. By these allusions a truth in the understanding is as it were reflected by the Imagination; we are able to see something like colour and shape in a notion, and to discover a scheme of thoughts traced out upon matter. And here the mind receives a great deal of satisfaction, and has two of its faculties gratified at the same time, while the fancy is busy in copying after the understanding, and transcribing ideas out of the intellectual world into the material.

The great art of a Writer shews it self in the choice of pleasing allusions, which are generally to be taken from the great or beautiful works of art or nature; for though whatever is new or uncommon is apt to delight the Imagination, the chief design of an allusion being to illustrate and explain the passages of an Author, it should be always borrowed from what is more known and common, than the passages which are to be explained.

Allegories, when well chosen, are like so many tracks of light in a discourse, that make every thing about them clear and beautiful. A noble Metaphor, when it is placed to an advantage, casts a kind of glory round it, and darts a lustre through a whole sentence: these different kinds of allusion are but so many different manners of similitude, and, that they may please the Imagination, the likenes ought to be very exact, or very agreeable, as we love to see a picture where the resemblance is just, or the posture and air graceful. But we often find eminent writers very faulty in this respect; great scholars are apt to fetch their companions and and allusions from the sciences in which they are most conversant, so that a man may see the compass of their learning in a treatise on the most indifferent subject. I have read a discourse upon Love, which none but a profound Chymist could understand, and have heard many a Sermon that should only have been preached before a congregation of Cartesians.
On the contrary, your men of business usually have recourse to such instances as are too mean and familiar. They are for drawing the reader into a game of Chefs or Tennis, or for leading him from shop to shop, in the cant of particular trades and employments. It is certain, there may be found an infinite variety of very agreeable allusions in both these kinds, but, for the generality, the most entertaining ones lie in the works of Nature, which are obvious to all capacities, and more delightful than what is to be found in arts and sciences.

It is this talent of affecting the Imagination, that gives an embellishment to good sense, and makes one man's compositions more agreeable than another's. It sets off all writings in general, but is the very life and highest perfection of Poetry. Where it shines in an eminent degree, it has preferred several poems for many ages, that have nothing else to recommend them; and where all the other beauties are present, the work appears dry and insipid, if this single one be wanting. It has something in it like Creation; it bestows a kind of existence, and draws up to the reader’s view several objects which are not to be found in Being. It makes additions to nature, and gives a greater variety to God’s works. In a word, it is able to beautify and adorn the most illustrious scenes in the universe, or to fill the mind with more glorious shows and apparitions, than can be found in any part of it.

We have now discover’d the several originals of those pleasures that gratifie the fancy; and here, perhaps, it would not be very difficult to call under their proper heads those contrary objects, which are apt to fill it with delight and terror; for the Imagination is as liable to pain as pleasure. When the brain is hurt by any accident, or the mind disordered by dreams or sickness, the fancy is over-run with wild difmal ideas, and terrified with a thousand hideous monsters of its own framing.

Enmendidum veluti demens videt agmina Pentheus,
Et solem geminum, et duplices fo offendere Thebas.
Aut Agamennonis fecit agitatus Orestes,
Ammatam faciunt matrem et ferpentibus atris
Cum videt, ultraeque sedent in limine Dirae.
Virg.

There
There is not a sight in nature so mortifying as that of a distracted person, when his imagination is troubled, and his whole soul disordered and confused. Babylon in ruins is not so melancholy a spectacle. But to quit so disagreeable a subject, I shall only consider, by way of conclusion, what an infinite advantage this faculty gives an almighty Being over the soul of man, and how great a measure of happiness or misery we are capable of receiving from the imagination only.

We have already seen the influence that one man has over the fancy of another; and with what ease he conveys into it a variety of imagery; how great a power then may we suppose lodged in him, who knows all the ways of affecting the imagination, who can infuse what ideas he pleases, and fill those ideas with terror or delight to what degree he thinks fit? He can excite images in the mind, without the help of words, and make scenes rise up before us and seem present to the eye, without the assistance of bodies or exterior objects. He can transport the imagination with such beautiful and glorious visions, as cannot possibly enter into our present conceptions, or haunt it with such ghastly spectres and apparitions, as would make us hope for annihilation, and think existence no better than a curse. In short, he can so exquisitely ravish or torture the soul through this single faculty, as might suffice to make up the whole Heaven or Hell of any finite Being.

N° 433. Thursday, July 17.

Perlege Meonio cantatas carmine ranas,
Et frantem nugas solvere disce meis. Mart.

The moral world, as consisting of males and females, is of a mixed nature, and filled with several customs, fashions and ceremonies, which would have no place in it, were there but one sex. Had our species no females in it, men would be quite different creatures from what they are at present; their endeavours to please the opposite sex, polishes and refines them out of those manners which are most natural to them, and often fits them upon modelling themselves, not according to
to the plans which they approve in their own opinions, but according to to the plans which they think are most agreeable to the Female world. In a word, man would not only be an unhappy, but a rude unfinished creature, were he conversant with none but those of his own make.

Women, on the other side, are apt to form themselves in every thing with regard to that other half of reasonable creatures, with whom they are here blended and confused; their thoughts are ever turned upon apppearing amiable to the other sex; they talk, and move, and smile, with a design upon us; every feature of their faces, every part of their dress is filled with snares and allurements. There would be no such animals as Prudes or Coquettes in the world, were there not such an animal as man.
In short, it is the male that gives charms to mankind, that produces an air in their faces, a grace in their motions, a softness in their voices, and a delicacy in their complections.

As this mutual regard between the two sexes tends to the improvement of each of them, we may observe that men are apt to degenerate into rough and brutal natures, who live as if there were no such things as women in the world; as on the contrary, women, who have an indifference or aversion for their counterpart parts in human nature, are generally lower and unamiable, fluttish and cenforious.

I am led into this train of thoughts by a little manuscript which is lately fallen into my hands, and which I shall communicate to the Reader, as I have done some other curious pieces of the same nature, without troubling him with any enquiries about the Author of it. It contains a summary account of two different states which bordered upon one another. The one was a Commonwealth of Amazons, or women without men; the other was a Republick of males that had not a woman in their whole community. As these two states bordered upon one another, it was their way, it seems, to meet upon their frontiers at a certain feast of the year, where those among the men who had not made their choice in any former meeting, associated themselves with particular women, whom they were afterwards obliged to look upon as their wives in every one of the every yearly encounters. The children that sprang from this alliance, if males, were sent to their respective fathers; if females, continued with their mothers. By means of this anniversary carnival, which lasted about a week, the Commonwealths were recruited from time to time, and supplied with their respective subjects.

These two States were engaged together in a perpetual league, offensive and defensive, so that if any foreign Potentate offered to attack either
ther of them, both the sexes fell upon him at once, and quickly brought him to reason. It was remarkable that for many ages this agreement continued inviolable between the two states, notwithstanding, as was said before, they were husbands and wives: but this will not appear so wonderful, if we consider that they did not live together above a week in a year.

In the account which my author gives of the male republick, there were several customs very remarkable. The men never shaved their beards, or pared their nails above once in a twelvemonth, which was probably about the time of the great annual meeting upon their frontiers. I find the name of a minister of state in one part of their history, who was fined for appearing too frequently in clean linen; and of a certain great general who was turned out of his post for effeminacy, it having been proved upon him by several credible witnesses that he washed his face every morning. If any member of the Commonwealth had a soft voice, a smooth face, or a supple behaviour, he was banished into the Commonwealth of females, where he was treated as a slave, dressed in petticoats, and set a spinning. They had no titles of honour among them, but such as denoted some bodily strength or perfection, as such an one the Tall, such an one the Stocky, such an one the Gruff. Their publick debates were generally managed with kicks and cuffs, in which they often came from the council-table with broken shins, black eyes and bloody noses. When they would reproach a man in the most bitter terms, they would tell him his teeth were white, or that he had a fair skin, and a soft hand. The greatest man I met with in their history, was one who could lift five hundred weight, and wore such a prodigious pair of whiskers as had never been seen in the Commonwealth before his time. These accomplishments it seems had rendered him so popular, that if he had not died very seasonably, it is thought he might have enslaved the republick. Having made this short extract out of the history of the male Commonwealth, I shall look into the history of the neighbouring state which consisted of females, and if I find anything in it, will not fail to communicate it to the public.
HAVING carefully perused the Manuscript I mentioned in my yesterday's paper, so far as it relates to the republick of women, I find in it several particulars which may very well deserve the Reader's attention.

The girls of quality, from six to twelve years old, were put to public schools, where they learned to box and play at cudgels, with several other accomplishments of the same nature; so that nothing was more usual than to see a little Miss returning home at night with a broken pate, or two or three teeth knocked out of her head. They were afterwards taught to ride the great horse, to shoot, dart, or fling, and lifted into several companies, in order to perfect themselves in military exercises. No woman was to be married until she had killed her man. The Ladies of fashion used to play with young lions instead of lap-dogs, and when they made any parties of diversion, instead of entertaining themselves at Ombre or Piquet, they would wrestle and pitch the bat for a whole afternoon together. There was never any such thing as a blush seen, or a sigh heard, in the Commonwealth. The women never dressed but to look terrible, to which end they sometimes after a battle painted their cheeks with the blood of their enemies. For this reason likewise the face which had the most scars was looked upon as the most beautiful. If they found lace, jewels, ribbons, or any ornaments in silver or gold among the booty which they had taken, they used to dress their horses with it, but never entertained a thought of wearing it themselves. There were particular rights and privileges allowed to any member of the Commonwealth, who was a mother of three daughters. The Senate was made up of old women; for by the laws of the country none was to be a Councillor of State that was not past child-bearing. They used to boast their republick had continued four thousand years, which is altogether improbable, unless we may suppose, what I am very apt to think, that they measured their time by lunar years.

There was a great revolution brought about in this female republick, by means of a neighbouring King, who had made war upon them several years with various success, and at length overthrew them in a very great battle. This defeat they ascribe to several causes; some say that the Secretary of State having been troubled with the vapours, had committed some fatal mistakes in several dispatches about that time. Others pretend, that the first Minister being big with child, could not attend the publick affairs, as to great an exigency of state required; but this I can give no manner of credit to, since it seems to contradict a fundamental maxim in their government, which I have before mentioned. My Author gives the most probable reason of this great disaster; for he affirms, that the General was brought to bed, or (as others say) miscarried the very night before the battle: however it was, this signal overthrow obliged them to call in the male republick to their assistance; but notwithstanding their common efforts to repulse the victorious enemy, the war continued for many years before they could entirely bring it to a happy conclusion.

The campaigns which both sexes passed together, made them so well acquainted with one another, that at the end of the war they did not care for parting. In the beginning of it they lodged in separate camps, but afterwards as they grew more familiar, they pitched their tents promiscuously.

From this time the armies being chequered with both sexes, they polished apace. The men used to invite their fellow-soldiers into their quarters, and would dress their tents with flowers and boughs, for their reception. If they chanced to like one more than another, they would be cutting her name in the table, or chalking out her figure upon a wall, or talking of her in a kind of rapturous language, which by degrees improved into verse and sonnet. These were as the first rudiments of Architecture, Painting, and Poetry among this savage people. After any advantage over the enemy, both sexes used to jump together and make a clattering with their swords and shields, for joy, which in a few years produced several regular tunes and set dances.
As the two armies romped on these occasions, the women complained of the thick bulky beards and long nails of their confederates, who thereupon took care to prune themselves into such figures as were most pleasing to their female friends and allies.

When they had taken any spoils from the enemy, the men would make a present of every thing that was rich and showy to the women whom they most admired, and would frequently drefs the necks, or heads, or arms of their mistresses, with any thing which they thought appeared gay or pretty. The women observing that the men took delight in looking upon them, when they were adorned with such trappings and gugaws, set their heads at work to find out new inventions, and to out-shine one another in all councils of war or the like solemn meetings. On the other hand, the men observing how the women's hearts were set upon finery, begun to embellish themselves and look as agreeably as they could in the eyes of their associates. In short, after a few years converging together, the women had learnt to finile, and the men to ogle, the women grew soft, and the men lively.

When they had thus irresistibly formed one another, upon the finishing of the war, which concluded with an entire conquest over their common enemy, the Colonels in one army married the Colonels in the other; the Captains in the same manner took the Captains to their wives: the whole body of common soldiers were matched, after the example of their leaders. By this means the two republicks incorporated with one another, and became the most flourishing and polite government in the part of the world which they inhabited.

Saturday,
Nec duo sunt, at forma duplex, nec resina disci
Nec puer ut possint, neutrumque et utrumque videntur. Ovid.

MOST of the papers I give the public are written on subjects that never vary, but are for ever fixed and immutable. Of this kind are all my more serious essays and discourses; but there is anothother sort of Speculations, which I consider as occasional papers, that take their rise from the folly, extravagance, and caprice of the present Age.
For I look upon my self as one set to watch the manners and behaviour of my countrymen and contemporaries, and to mark down every absurd fashion, ridiculous custom, or affected form of speech that makes its appearance in the world, during the course of these my Speculations. The petticoat no sooner begun to swell, but I observed its motions. The party-patches had not time to muster themselves before I detected them.
I had intelligence of the coloured hood the very first time it appeared in a public assembly. I might here mention several other the like contin-genent subjects, upon which I have bestowed distinct papers. By this means I have so effectually quelled those irregularities which gave occasion to them, that I am afraid posterity will scarce have a sufficient idea of them to relish those discourses which were in no little vogue at the time when they were written. They will be apt to think that the fashions and cufoms I attacked were some fantastic conceits of my own, and that their Great-grandmothers could not be so whimsical as I have represented them. For this reason, when I think on the figure my several volumes of speculations will make about a hundred years hence, I consider them as so many pieces of old plate, where the weight will be regarded, but the fashion lost.

Among the several female extravagancies I have already taken notice of, there is one which still keeps its ground. I mean that of the Ladies who dress themselves in a hat and feather, a riding-coat and a perriwig;
or at least tie up their hair in a bag or ribbond, in imitation of the fairest part of the opposite sex. As in my yesterday's paper I gave an account of the mixture of two sexes in one commonwealth, I shall here take notice of this mixture of two sexes in one person. I have already shewn my dislike of this immodest custom more than once; but in contempt of every thing I have hitherto said, I am informed that the highways about this great city are still very much infested with these female cavaliers.

I remember when I was at my friend Sir Roger de Coverley's about this time twelve-month, an equestrian Lady of this order appeared upon the plains which lay at a distance from his house. I was at that time walking in the fields with my old friend; and as his tenants ran out on every side to see so strange a sight, Sir Roger asked one of them who came by us, what it was? To which the country fellow replied, This is a Gentlewoman, having your Worship's preference, in a coat and hat. This produced a great deal of mirth at the Knight's house, where we had a plenty at the same time of another of his tenants, who meeting this gentleman-like Lady on the high way, was asked by her whether that was Coverley-hall; the honest man seeing only the male part of the Querist, replied, Yes, Sir; but upon the second question, whether Sir Roger de Coverley was a married man, having dropped his eye upon the petticoat, he changed his note into No Madam.

Had one of these Hermaphrodites appeared in Juvenal's days, with what an indignation should we have seen her described by that excellent幼年。 He would have represented her in her riding habit, as a greater monster than the Centaur. He would have called for sacrifices, or purifying waters, to expiate the appearance of such a prodigy. He would have invoked the shades of Portia or Lucretia, to see into what the Roman Ladies had transformed themselves.

For my own part, I am for treating the sex with greater tenderness, and have all along made use of the most gentle methods to bring them off from any little extravagance into which they are sometimes unwarily fallen: I think it however absolutely necessary to keep up the partition between the two sexes, and to take notice of the smallest encroachments which the one makes upon the other. I hope therefore that I shall not hear any more complaints on this subject. I am sure my five disciples who purse these my daily lectures, have profited but little by them, if they are capable of giving into such an amphibious dress. This I should not have mentioned, had not I lately met one of these my female Readers in in Hide Park, who looked upon me with a masculine assurance, and cocked her hat full in my face.

For my part, I have one general key to the behaviour of the fair sex. When I see them singular in any part of their dress, I conclude it is not without some evil intention; and therefore question not but the design of this strange fashion is torike more effectually their male beholders. Now to set them right in this particular, I would fain have them consider with themselves whether we are not more likely to be struck by a figure entirely female, than with such an one as we may see every day in our glasses: or, if they please, let them reflect upon their own hearts, and think how they would be affected should they meet a man on horseback, in his breeches and jack-boots, and at the same time dressed up in a commode and a night-rail.

I must observe that this fashion was first of all brought to us from France, a country which has infected all the nations in Europe with its levity. I speak not this in derogation of a whole people, having more than once found fault with those general reflections which strike at Kingdoms or Commonwealths in the grofs: a piece of cruelty, which an ingenious writer of our own compares to that of Caligula, who wished the Roman people had all but one neck, that he might behead them at a blow. I shall therefore only remark, that as liveliness and assurance are in a peculiar manner the qualifications of the French nation, the same habits and customs will not give the same offence to that people, which they produce among those of our own country. Modesty is our distinguishing character, as vivacity is theirs: and when this our national virtue appears in that family-beauty, for which our British Ladies are celebrated above all others in the universe, it makes up the most amiable object that the eye of man can possibly behold.
OVID describes the palace of Fame as situated in the very center of the universe, and perforated with so many windows and avenues as gave her the sight of every thing that was done in the heavens, in the earth, and in the sea. The structure of it was contrived in so admirable a manner, that it echoed every word which was spoken in the whole compass of nature; so that the Palace, says the Poet, was always filled with a confused hubbub of low dying sounds, the voices being almost spent and worn out before they arrived at this general rendezvous of speeches and whispers.

I consider Courts with the same regard to the governments which they superintend, as Ovid's palace of Fame, with regard to the Universe. The eyes of a watchful Minister run through the whole people. There is scarce a murmur or complaint, that does not reach his ears. They have News-gatherers and Intelligencers distributed in their several walks and quarters, who bring in their respective quotas, and make them acquainted with the discourse and conversation of the whole kingdom or commonwealth where they are employed. The wisest of Kings, alluding to these invisible and unsuspected spies who are planted by Kings and Rulers over their fellow-citizens, as well as those voluntary informers that are buzzing about the ears of a great man, and making their court by such secret methods of intelligence, has given us a very prudent caution:

Curse not the King, nor in thy thought, and curse not the rich in thy bed-chamber: for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.

As it is abfolutely necessary for Rulers to make use of other peoples eyes and ears, they should take particular care to do it in such manner, that it may not bear too hard on the person whose life and conversation are ... are enquired into. A man who is capable of so infamous a calling as that of a Spy, is not very much to be relied upon. He can have no great ties of honour, or checks of conscience, to restrain him in those covert evidences, where the person accused has no opportunity of vindicating himself. He will be more industrious to carry that which is grateful, than that which is true. There will be no occasion for him, if he does not hear and see things worth discovery; so that he naturally inflames every word and circumstance, aggravates what is faulty, perverts what is good, and misrepresents what is indifferent. Nor is it to be doubted but that such ignominious wretches let their private passions into the service their clandestine informations, and often wreck their particular spite or malice against the person whom they are set to watch. It is a pleasant scene enough, which an Italian Author describes between a Spy, and a Cardinal who employed him. The Cardinal is represented as minutely down every thing that is told him. The Spy begins with a low voice. Such an one, the Advocate, whispered to one of his friends, within my hearing, that your Eminence was a very great poltroon; and after having given his Patron time to take it down, adds, that another called him a mercenary Rascal in a public conversation. The Cardinal replies, Very well, and bids him go on. The Spy proceeds, and loads him with reports of the same nature, till the Cardinal rises in great wrath, calls him an impudent scoundrel, and kicks him out of the room.

It is observed of great and heroic minds, that they have not only shew'd a particular disregard to those unmerited reproaches which have been cast upon them, but have been altogether free from that impertinent curiosity of enquiring after them, or the poor revenge of resenting them. The Histories of Alexander and Cæsar are full of this kind of instances. Vulgar souls are of a quite contrary character. Dionysius, the tyrant of Sicily, had a dungeon which was a very curious piece of Architecture; and of which, as I am informed, there are still to be seen some remains in that island. It was called Dionysius's Ear, and built with several little windings and labyrinths in the form of a real ear. The structure of it made it a kind of whispering place, but such a one as gathered the voice of him who spake into a funnel, which was placed at the very top of it. The tyrant used to lodge all his flate criminals, or those whom he supposed to be engaged together in any evil designs upon him, in this dungeon. He had at the same time an apartment over it, where he used to apply himself to the funnel, and by that means over-hear every thing that was whispered in the dungeon. I believe one may venture to affirm, that a Cæsar or an Alexander would rather have died by the treaçon, than have used such díngenuous means for the detecting of it.

A man, who in ordinary life is very inquisitive after every thing which is spoken ill of him, pæsses his time but very indifferently. He is wounded by every arrow that is shot at him, and puts in the power of every insigníciouss enemy to disquiet him. Nay, he will suffer from what has been said of him, when it is forgotten by those who said or heard it. For this reason I could never bear one of those oblicious friends, that would be telling every malignant report, every idle cenfure that pass'd upon me. The tongue of man is so petulant, and his thoughts so variable, that one should not lay too great a stress upon any present speeches or opinions. Praise and obloquy proceed very frequently out of the same month upon the same person, and upon the same occasion. A generous enemy will sometimes bestow commendations, as the dearest friend cannot sometimes refrain from speaking ill. The man who is indifferent in either of these respects, gives his opinion at random, and praises or disapproves as he finds himself in humour.

I shall conclude this eflay with part of a character, which is finely drawn by the Earl of Clarendon, in the first book of his history, and which gives us the lively picture of a great man reizing himself with an aburd curiosi-ity.

"He had not that application and submissión, and reverence for the Queen, as might have been expected from his wisdom and breeding; and often crost he pretextses and desires with more rudenes than was natural to him. Yet he was impertinent and solicitous to know what her Majesty said of him in private, and what reflections she had towards him. And when by some confidents, who had their ends up on him from those offices, he was informed of some bitter expressions fallen from her Majesty, he was so exceedingly afflicted and tormentes, with the sense of it, that sometimes by passionate complaints and represenlations to the King; sometimes by more dutiful addresses and expostulations with the Queen, in bewailing his misfortune; he frequently exposèd himself, and left his condition worse than it was before, and the eclairciment commonly ended in the discovery of the persons from whom he had receivèd his most secret intelligence."
I Have already given my Reader an account of a set of merry fellows, who are passing their summer together in the country, being provided of a great house, where there is not only a convenient apartment for every particular person, but a large infirmary for the reception of such of them as are any way indisposed, or out of humour. Having lately received a letter from the Secretary of this society, by order of the whole fraternity, which acquaints me with their behaviour during the last week, I shall here make a present of it to the public.

Mr. Spectator,

"We are glad to find that you approve the establishment which we have here made for the retrieving of good manners and agreeable conversation, and shall use our best endeavours to improve our selves in this our summer retirement, that we may next winter serve as patterns to the town. But to the end that this our institution may be no less advantageous to the public than to our selves, we shall communicate to you one week of our proceedings, desiring you at the same time, if you see any thing faulty in them, to favour us with your admonitions. For you must know, Sir, that it has been proposed among us to chuse you for our Visitor, to which I must further add, that one of the College having declared last week, he did not like the Spectator of the day, and not being able to alignt any just reasons for such his dislike, he was sent to the infirmary, Namine contradicente.

"On Monday the assembly was in very good humour, having received some recruits of French claret that morning; when unluckily, towards the middle of the dinner, one of the company swore at his servant in a very rough manner, for having put too much water in his wine. Upon which the president of the day, who is always the mouth of the company, after having convinced him of the impertinence of his passion, lion, and the insult it had made upon the company, ordered his man to take him from the table, and convey him to the infirmary. There was but one more sent away that day; this was a Gentleman who is reckoned by some persons one of the greatest Wits, and by others one of the greatest Boeby about town. This you will say is a strange character, but what makes it stranger yet, it is a very true one, for he is perpetually the reverse of himself, being always merry or dull to excess. We brought him hither to divert us, which he did very well upon the road, having lavished away as much wit and laughter upon the hackney coach-man, as might have served him during his whole stay here, had it been duly managed. He had been lumpish for two or three days, but was so far connived at, in hopes of recovery, that we dispatched one of the briskest fellows among the brotherhood into the infirmary, for having told him at table he was not merry. But our President observing that he indulged himself in this long fit of stupidity, and considering it as a contempt of the College, ordered him to retire into the place prepared for such companions. He was no sooner got into it, but his wit and mirth returned upon him in so violent a manner, that he shook the whole infirmary with the noise of it, and had so good an effect upon the rest of the patients, that he brought them all out to dinner with him the next day.

On Tuesday we were no sooner sat down, but one of the company complained that his head ached; upon which another asked him, in an insolent manner, what he did there then; this insensibly grew into some warm words; so that the President, in order to keep the peace, gave directions to take them both from the table, and lodge them in the infirmary. Not long after, another of the company telling us, he knew by a pain in his shoulder that we should have some rain, the President ordered him to be removed, and placed as a weather-glass in the apartment above-mentioned.

On Wednesday a Gentleman having received a letter written in a woman's hand, and changing colour twice or thrice as he read it, desired leave to retire into the infirmary. The President contented, but denied him the use of pen, ink and paper till such time as he had slept upon it. One of the company being seated at the lower end of the table, and discovering his secret discontent by finding fault with every dish that was served up, and refusing to laugh at any thing that was said, the President told him, that he found he was in an uneasy state, and desired him to accommodate himself better in the infirmary. After ter dinner a very honest fellow chancing to let a punn fall from him, his neighbour cried out, to the infirmary; at the same time pretending to be sick at it, as having the same natural antipathy to a punn, which some have to a cat. This produced a long debate. Upon the whole, the Punntler was acquitted, and his neighbour sent off.

On Thursday there was but one delinquent. This was a Gentleman of strong voice, but weak understanding. He had unluckily engaged himself in a dispute with a man of excellent sense, but of a modest elocution. The man of heat replied to every answer of his antagonist with a louder note than ordinary, and only raised his voice when he should have enforced his argument. Finding himself at length driven to an absurdity, he still reasoned in a more clamorous and confused manner, and to make the greater impression upon his hearers, concluded with a loud thump upon the table. The President immediately ordered him to be carried off, and dieted with water-gruel, till such time as he should be sufficiently weakened for conversation.

On Friday there pass'd very little remarkable, saving only, that several petitions were read of the persons in custody, desiring to be released from their confinement, and vouching for one another's good behaviour for the future.

On Saturday we received many excuses from persons who had found themselves in an unfacile temper, and had voluntarily shut themselves up. The infirmary was indeed never so full as on this day, which I was at some loss to account for, till upon my going abroad I observed that it was an Easterly wind. The retirement of most of my friends has given me opportunity and leisure of writing you this letter, which I must not conclude without assuring you, that all the members of our College, as well those who are under confinement, as those who are at liberty, are your very humble servants, though none more than,

Saturday,
MAN, considered in himself, is a very helpless and a very wretched Being. He is subject every moment to the greatest calamities and misfortunes. He is beft with dangers on all sides, and may become unhappy by numberless casualties, whick he could not foresee, nor have prevented, had he foreseen them.

It is our comfort, while we are obnoxious to so many accidents, that we are under the care of one who directs contingencies, and has in his hands the management of every thing that is capable of annoying or offending us; who knows the assistance we stand in need of, and is always ready to bestow it on those who ask it of him.

The natural homage, which such a creature bears to so infinitely Wise and Good a Being, is a firm reliance on him for the blessings and conveniences of life, and an habitual trust in him for deliverance out of all such dangers and difficulties as may befal us.

The man, who always lives in this disposition of mind, has not the same dark and melancholy views of human nature, as he who considers himself abstractedly from this relation to the Supreme Being. At the same time that he reflects upon his own weakness and imperfection, he comforts himself with the contemplation of those divine attributes, which are employed for his safety and his welfare. He finds his want of foresight made up by the Omniscience of him who is his support. He is not sensible of his own want of strength, when he knows that his Helper is Almighty. In short, the person who has a firm trust in the Supreme Being, is powerful in his Power, wise by his Wisdom, happy by his Happiness. He reaps the benefit of every Divine attribute, and loses his own insufficiency in the fullness of infinite Perfection.

To
To make our lives more ease to us, we are commanded to put our trust in him, who is thus able to relieve and succour us; the Divine Goodess having made such a reliance a duty, notwithstanding we should have been miserable, had it been forbidden us.

Among several motives, which might be made use of to recommend this duty to us, I shall only take notice of these that follow.
The first and strongest is, that we are promised, He will not fail those who put their trust in him.

But without considering the supernatural blessing which accompanies this duty, we may observe that it has a natural tendency to its own reward, or in other words, that this firm trust and confidence in the great dispenser of all things, contributes very much to the getting clear of any affliction, or to the bearing it manfully. A person who believes he has his succour at hand, and that he acts in the sight of his friend, often exserts himself beyond his abilities, and does wonders that are not to be matched by one who is not animated with such a confidence of succes.
I could produce instances from history, of Generals, who out of a belief that they were under the protection of some invisible assists, did not only encourage their soldiers to do their utmost, but have acted them-

The practice of this virtue administers great comfort to the mind of man in times of poverty and affliction, but most of all in the hour of death. When the soul is hovering in the last moments of its separation, when it is just entering on another state of existence, to converse with scenes, and objects, and companions that are altogether new; what can support her under such tremblings of thought, such fear, such anxiety, such apprehensions, but the calling of all her cares upon him who first gave her Being, who has conducted her through one stage of it, and will be always with her to guide and comfort her in her progress through

David has very beautifully represented this steady reliance on God Almighty in his twenty third Psalm, which is a kind of Pastoral Hymn, and filled with those allusions which are usual in that kind of writing.
As the poetry is very exquisite, I shall present my Reader with the following translation of it.

I. The
I.
The Lord my pastures shall prepare,
And feed me with a shepherd's care;
His presence shall my wants supply,
And guard me with a watchful eye;
My noon-day walks he shall attend,
And all my midnight hours defend.

II.
When in the sultry glebe I faint,
Or on the thirsty mountain pant;
To fertile vales and dewy meads,
My weary wand'ring steps he leads;
Where peaceful rivers soft and slow,
Amid the verdant landscape flow.

III.
Thou in the paths of death I tread,
With gloomy horrors o'er-spread;
My steadfast heart shall fear no ill,
For thou, O Lord, art with me still;
Thy friendly crook shall give me aid,
And guide me through the dreadful shade.

IV.
Thou in a bare and rugged way,
Through devious lonely wilds I stray,
Thy bounty shall my pains beguile;
The barren wilderness shall smite,
With sudden greens and herbage crown'd,
And streams shall murmur all around.

Thursday.
This is the day on which many eminent authors will probably publish their last words. I am afraid that few of our weekly historians, who are men that above all others delight in war, will be able to subsist under the weight of a stamp, and an approaching peace. A sheet of blank paper that must have this new Imprimatur clapt upon it, before it is qualified to communicate any thing to the publick, will make its way in the world but very heavily. In short, the necessity of carrying a stamp, and the improbability of notifying a bloody battle, will, I am afraid, both concur to the sinking of those thin folios, which have every other day retailed to us the history of Europe for several years past. A facetious friend of mine, who loves a pun, calls this present mortality among authors, The fall of the leaf.

I remember, upon Mr. Baxter's death, there was published a sheet of very good sayings, inscribed, The last words of Mr. Baxter. The title told so great a number of these papers, that about a week after, there came out a second sheet inscribed, More last words of Mr. Baxter. In the same manner, I have reason to think, that several ingenious writers, who have taken their leave of the publick, in farewell papers, will not give over so, but intend to appear again, though perhaps under another form, and with a different title. Be that as it will, it is my business, in this place, to give an account of my own intentions, and to acquaint my Reader with the motives by which I act, in this great crisis of the republic of letters.

I have been long debating in my own heart, whether I should throw up my pen, as an Author that is cashiered by the Act of Parliament, which is to operate within these four and twenty hours, or whether I should still persist in laying my Speculations, from day to day, before the publick. The argument which prevails with me most on the first side of the question is, that I am informed by my Bookseller he must raise the price of every single paper to two-pence, or that he shall not be able to pay the duty of it. Now as I am very desirous my readers should have their learning as cheap as possible, it is with great difficulty that I comply with him in this particular.

However, upon laying my reasons together in the ballance, I find that those which plead for the continuance of this work, have much the greater weight. For, in the first place, in recompence for the expense to which this will put my readers, it is to be hoped they may receive from every paper so much instruction, as will be a very good equivalent. And, in order to this, I would not advise any one to take it in, who, after the perusal of it, does not find himself two-pence the wiser, or the better man for it; or who, upon examination, does not believe that he has had two penny-worth of mirth or instruction for his money.

But I must confess there is another motive which prevails with me more than the former. I consider that the tax on paper was given for the support of the Government; and as I have enemies, who are apt to pervert every thing I do or say, I fear they would ascribe the laying down my paper, on such an occasion, to a spirit of malecontentedness, which I am resolved none shall ever justly upbraid me with. No, I shall glory in contributing my utmost to the weal publick; and if my country receives five or six pounds a-day by my labours, I shall be very well pleased to find my self so useful a member. It is a received maxim, that no honest man should enrich himself by methods that are prejudicial to the Community in which he lives, and by the same rule I think we may pronounce the person to deserve very well of his country-men, whose labours bring more into the publick coffers, than into his own pocket.

Since I have mentioned the word Enemies, I must explain my self so far as to acquaint my Reader, that I mean only the insignificant party zealists on both sides; men of such poor narrow souls, that they are not capable of thinking on any thing but with an eye to Whig or Tory. Du-ing the course of this paper, I have been accused by these delpicable wretches of trimming, time-serving, perfonal reflection, secret hate, and the like. Now, though in these my compositions, it is visible to any reader of common sense, that I consider nothing but my subject, which is always of an indifferent nature; how is it possible for me to write so clear of party, as not to lie open to the censures of those who will be applying every sentence, and finding out persons and things in it, which it has no regard to?

Seve-
Several paltry scribblers and declaimers have done me the honour to be dull upon me in reflections of this nature; but notwithstanding my name has been sometimes traduced by this contemptible tribe of men, I have hitherto avoided all animadversions upon them. The truth of it is, I am afraid of making them appear considerable by taking notice of them, for they are like those imperceptible insects which are discovered by the microscope, and cannot be made the subject of observation without being magnified.

Having mentioned those few who have shewn themselves the enemies of this paper, I should be very ungrateful to the publick, did not I at the same time testify my gratitude to those who are its friends, in which number I may reckon many of the most distinguished persons of all conditions, parties and professions in the Isle of Great Britain. I am not so vain as to think this approbation is so much due to the performance as to the design. There is, and ever will be, justice enough in the world, to afford patronage and protection for those who endeavour to advance truth and virtue, without regard to the passions and prejudices of any particular cause or faction. If I have any other merit in me, it is that I have new-pointed all the batteries of ridicule. They have been generally planted against persons who have appeared serious rather than absurd; or at best, have aimed rather at what is unfashionable than what is vicious. For my own part, I have endeavoured to make nothing ridiculous that is not in some measure criminal. I have set up the immoral man as the object of derision: in short, if I have not formed a new weapon against vice and irreligion, I have at least shown how that weapon may be put to a right use, which has so often fought the battles of impiety and prophaneness.

Friday
Since two or three writers of Comedy who are now living have taken their farewell of the Stage, those who succeed them finding themselves incapable of rising up to their wit, humour and good sense, have only imitated them in some of those loose unguarded strokes, in which they complied with the corrupt taste of the more vicious part of their audience. When persons of a low genius attempt this kind of writing, they know no difference between being merry and being lewd. It is with an eye to some of these degenerate compositions that I have written the following discourse.

Were our English Stage but half so virtuous as that of the Greeks or Romans, we should quickly see the influence of it in the behaviour of all the polite part of mankind. It would not be fashionable to ridicule religion, or its professors; the man of pleasure would not be the compleat Gentleman; vanity would be out of countenance, and every quality which is ornamental to human nature, would meet with that esteem which is due to it.

If the English Stage were under the same regulations the Athenian was formerly, it would have the same effect that had, in recommending the religion, the government, and publick worship of its country. Were our Plays subject to proper inspections and limitations, we might not only pass away several of our vacant hours in the highest entertainments; but should always rise from them wiser and better than we sat down to them.

It is one of the most unaccountable things in our Age, that the lewdness of our Theatre should be so much complained of, and so little redressed. It is to be hoped, that some time or other we may be at leisure to restrain the licentiousness of the Theatre, and make it contribute its assistance to the advancement of morality, and to the reformation of the Age. As matters stand at present, multitudes are shut out from this noble noble diversion, by reason of those abuses and corruptions that accompany it. A father is often afraid that his daughter should be ruined by those entertainments, which were invented for the accomplishment and refining of human nature. The Athenian and Roman Plays were written with such a regard to morality, that Socrates used to frequent the one, and Cicero the other.

It happened once indeed, that Cato dropped into the Roman Theatre, when the Floralia were to be represented; and as in that performance, which was a kind of religious ceremony, there were several indecent parts to be acted, the people refused to see them whilst Cato was present. Martial on this hint made the following Epigram, which we must suppose was applied to some grave friend of his, that had been accidentally present at such entertainment.

Nolles jacere dulce cum sacrum Flore,
Casasque insùs, et licentiam vulgi,
Cum in Theatrum Cato severus venisti?
An id quum veneras, ut exires?

Why dost thou come, great Censor of thy Age,
To see the loose diversions of the Stage?
With awful countenance and brow severe,
What in the name of Goodness dost thou here?
See the混t crowd! how giddy, lewd and vain!
Didst thou come in but to go out again?

An accident of this nature might happen once in an Age among the Greeks or Romans; but they were too wise and good to let the constant nightly entertainment be of such a nature, that people of the most refined and virtuous could not be at it. Whatever vices are represented upon the Stage, they ought to be so marked and branded by the Poet, as not to appear either laudable or amiable in the person who is tainted with them. But if we look into the English Comedies above-mentioned, we would think they were formed upon a quite contrary maxim, and that this rule, though it held good upon the heathen Stage, was not to be regarded in Christian Theatres. There is another rule likewise, which was observed by Authors of antiquity, and which these modern Geniuses have no regard to, and that was, never to chuse an improper subject for ridicule. Now a subject is improper for ridicule, if it is apt to stir up horror and commiseration rather than laughter. For this reason, we do not find any Comedy.
Comedy in so polite an Author as Terence, raised upon the violations of the Marriage-bed. The falsehood of the wife or husband has given occasion to noble Tragedies, but a Scipio or a Lelius would have looked upon incest or murder to have been improper subjects for Comedy. On the contrary, Cuckoldom is the basis of most of our modern Plays. If an Alderman appears upon the Stage, you may be sure it is in order to be cuckolded. An husband that is a little grave or elderly, generally meets with the same fate. Knights and Baronets, Country Squires, and Justices of the Quorum, come up to town for no other purpose. I have seen poor Doggett cuckolded in all these capacities. In short, our English writers are as frequently severe upon this innocent unhappy creature, commonly known by the name of a Cuckold, as the ancient Comic writers were upon an eating parasite, or a vain-glorious soldier.

At the same time the Poet so contrives matters, that the two criminals are the favourites of the audience. We sit still, and with well to them through the whole Play, are pleased when they meet with proper opportunities, and out of humour when they are disappointed. The truth of it is, the accomplished Gentleman upon the English Stage, is the person that is familiar with other men's wives, and indifferent to his own: as the fine woman is generally a composition of sprightlynes and falsehood. I do not know whether it proceeds from barrenness of invention, depravation of manners, or ignorance of mankind; but I have often wondered that our ordinary Poets cannot frame to themselves the idea of a fine man who is not a whore-master, or of a fine woman that is not a jilt.

I have sometimes thought of compiling a System of Ethics out of the writings of these corrupt Poets, under the title of Stage Morality. But I have been diverted from this thought, by a project which has been executed by an ingenious Gentleman of my acquaintance. He has composed, it seems, the history of a young fellow, who has taken all his notions of the world from the Stage, and who has directed himself in every circumstance of his life, and conversation, by the maxims and examples of the fine Gentleman in English Comedies. If I can prevail upon him to give me a copy of this new-fashioned Novel, I will bestow on it a place in my works, and question not but it may have as good an effect upon the Drama, as Don Quixote had upon Romance.

Saturday,
THERE is not a common-saying which has a better turn of sense in it, than what we often hear in the mouths of the vulgar, that Custom is a second nature. It is indeed able to form the man anew, and to give him inclinations and capacities altogether different from those he was born with. Dr. Plot, in his history of Staffordshire, tells us of an Idiot that chanceing to live within the sound of a Clock, and always amusing himself with counting the hour of the day whenever the clock struck, the clock being spoiled by some accident, the Idiot continued to strike and count the hour without the help of it, in the same manner as he had done when it was entire. Though I dare not vouch for the truth of this story, it is very certain that custom has a mechanical effect upon the body, at the same time that it has a very extraordinary influence upon the mind.

I shall in this paper consider one very remarkable effect which custom has upon human nature; and which, if rightly observed, may lead us into very useful rules of life. What I shall here take notice of in custom, is its wonderful efficacy in making every thing pleasant to us. A person who is addicted to play or gaming, though he took but little delight in it at first, by degrees contracts so strong an inclination towards it, and gives himself up so entirely to it, that it seems the only end of his Being. The love of a retired or a busy life will grow upon a man insensibly, as he is conversant in the one or the other, until he is utterly unqualified for relishing that to which he has been for some time exposed. Nay, a man may smoke, or drink, or take snuff, until he is unable to pass away his time without it; not to mention how our delight in any particular study, art, or science, riseth and improves in proportion to the application which we bestow upon it. Thus what was at first an exercise, becomes at length an entertainment. Our employments are changed into our diversions.
versions. The mind grows fond of those actions as are accustomed to, and is drawn with reluctance from those paths in which she has been used to walk.

Not only such actions as were at first indifferent to us, but even such as were painful, will by custom and practice become pleasant. Sir Francis Bacon observes in his natural philosophy, that our taste is never pleased better, than with those things which at first created a disgust in it. He gives particular instances of Claret, Coffee, and other liquors, which the palate seldom approves upon the first taste; but when it has once got a relish of them, generally retains it for life. The mind is constituted after the same manner, and after having habituated itself to any particular exercise or employment, not only loses its first aversion towards it, but conceives a certain fondness and affection for it. I have heard one of the greatest Geniuses of this Age has produced, who had been trained up in all the polite studies of antiquity, assure me, upon his being obliged to search into several rolls and records, that notwithstanding such an employment was at first very dry and irksome to him, he at last took an incredible pleasure in it, and preferred it even to the reading of Virgil or Cicero. The Reader will observe, that I have not here considered custom as it makes things easie, but as it renders them delightful; and though others have often made the same reflections, it is possible they may not have drawn those ueses from it, with which I intend to fill the remaining part of this paper.

If we consider attentively this property of human nature, it may instruct us in very fine moralities. In the first place, I would have no man discouraged with that kind of life or misery of action, in which the choice of others, or his own necessities, may have engaged him. It may perhaps be very disagreeable to him at first; but use and application will certainly render it not only less painful, but pleasing and satisfactory.

In the second place I would recommend to every one that admirable precept which Pythagoras is said to have given to his disciples, and which that Philosopher must have drawn from the observation I have enlarged upon. Optimum vitæ genus eligito, nam consistudo faciet jucundissimum. Pitch upon that course of life which is the most excellent, and custom will render it the most delightful. Men, whose circumstances will permit them to chuse their own way of life, are inexuceptable if they do not pursue that which their judgment tells them is the most laudable. The voice of Reason is more to be regarded than the bent of any present inclination, since, by the rule above-mentioned, inclination will at length come come over to Reason, though we can never force Reason to comply with Inclination.

In the third place, this observation may teach the most sensual and irreligious man, to overlook those hardships and difficulties which are apt to discourage him from the prosecution of a virtuous life. The Gods, said Heziod, have placed Labour before Virtue, the way to her is at first rough and difficult, but grows more smooth and easy the further you advance in it. The man who proceeds in it, with steadiness and resolution, will in a little time find, that her ways are ways of pleasantness, and that all her paths are peace.

To enforce this consideration, we may further observe, that the practice of religion will not only be attended with that pleasure, which naturally accompanies those actions to which we are habituated, but with those supernumerary joys of heart, that rise from the consciousness of such a pleasure, from the satisfaction of acting up to the dictates of reason, and from the prospect of an happy immortality.

In the fourth place, we may learn from this observation which we have made on the mind of man, to take particular care, when we are once settled in a regular course of life, how we too frequently indulge our selves in any the most innocent diversions and entertainments, since the mind may insensibly fall off from the relish of virtuous actions, and, by degrees, exchange that pleasure which it takes in the performance of its duty, for delights of a much more inferior and unprofitable nature.

The last use which I shall make of this remarkable property in human nature, of being delighted with those actions to which it is accustomed, is to shew how absolutely necessary it is for us to gain habits of virtue in this life, if we would enjoy the pleasures of the next. The state of bliss we call Heaven will not be capable of afflicting those minds which are not thus qualified for it; we must, in this world, gain a relish of truth and virtue, if we would be able to taste that knowledge and perfection, which are to make us happy in the next. The seeds of those spiritual joys and raptures, which are to rise up and flourish in the soul to all eternity, must be planted in her, during this her present state of probation. In short, Heaven is not to be looked upon only as the reward, but as the natural effect of a religious life.

On the other hand, those evil spirits, who, by long custom, have contracted in the body habits of lust and sensuality, malice and revenge, an aversion to every thing that is good, just or laudable, are naturally seasoned and prepared for pain and misery. Their torments have already taken root in them, they cannot be happy when divested of the body, unless we may suppose, that Providence will, in a manner, create them anew, and work a miracle in the rectification of their faculties. They may, indeed, take a kind of malignant pleasure in those actions to which they are accustomed, whilst in this life, but when they are removed from all those objects which are here apt to gratify them, they will naturally become their own tormentors, and cherish in themselves those painful habits of mind which are called in Scripture phrase, the Worm which never dies. This notion of heaven and hell is so very conformable to the light of nature, that it was discovered by several of the most exalted heathens. It has been finely improved by many eminent Divines of the last Age, as in particular by Arch-bishop Tillotson and Dr. Sherlock, but there is none who has raised such noble speculations upon it, as Dr. Scott, in the first book of his Christian Life, which is one of the finest and most rational schemes of Divinity that is written in our tongue, or in any other. That excellent Author has shown how every particular custom and habit of virtue will, in its own nature, produce the heaven, or a state of happiness, in him who shall hereafter practice it; as on the contrary, how every custom or habit of vice will be the natural hell of him in whom it subsists.

--- jam sævus apertam
In rabeæ capit verit jocus, et per benefas
Ire minax implete domo--

There is nothing so scandalous to a government, and detestable in the eyes of all good men, as defamatory papers and pamphlets; but at the same time there is nothing so difficult to tame, as a satirical Author. An angry writer, who cannot appear in print, naturally vents his spleen in libels and lampoons. A gay old woman, says the Fable, seeing all her wrinkles represented in a large Looking-glass, threw it upon the ground in a passion, and broke it in a thousand pieces; but as the was afterwards surveying the fragments with a spiteful kind of pleasure, she could not forbear uttering her self in the following soliloquy: What have I got by this revengeful blow of mine? I have only multiplied my deformity, and see an hundred ugly faces, where before I saw but one.

It has been proposed, to oblige every person that writes a book, or a paper, to swear himself the Author of it, and enter down in a publick register his name and place of abode.

This, indeed, would have effectually suppressed all printed scandal, which generally appears under borrowed names, or under none at all. But it is to be feared, that such an expedient would not only destroy scandal, but learning. It would operate promiscuously, and root up the corn and tares together. Not to mention some of the most celebrated works of piety, which have proceeded from anonymous Authors, who have made it their merit to convey to us so great a charity in secret: there are few works of genius that come out at first with the Author's name. The writer generally makes a trial of them in the world before he owns them; and, I believe, very few, who are capable of writing, would set pen to paper, if they knew, before hand, that they must not publish their productions but on such conditions. For my own part, I must declare, the papers I present the publick are like fairy favours, which shall last no longer than while the Author is concealed.

That which makes it particularly difficult to restrain these sons of calumny and defamation, is, that all sides are equally guilty of it, and that every dirty scribler is countenanced by great names, whose interests he propagates by such vile and infamous methods. I have never yet heard of a Ministry, who have inflicted an exemplary punishment on an Author that has supported their cause with falsehood and scandal, and treated, in a most cruel manner, the names of those who have been looked upon as their rivals and antagonists. Would a Government set an everlasting mark of their displeasure upon one of those infamous writers, who makes his court to them by tearing to pieces the reputation of a competitor, we should quickly see an end put to this race of vermin, that are a scandal to Government, and a reproach to human nature. Such a proceeding would make a minisiter of State shine in history, and would fill all mankind with a just abhorrence of persons who should treat him unworthily, and employ against him those arms which he scorned to make use of against his enemies.

I cannot think that any one will be so unjust as to imagine what I have here said, is spoken with a respect to any party or faction. Every one who has in him the sentiments either of a Christian or a Gentleman, cannot but be highly offended at this wicked and ungenerous practice which is so much in use among us at present, that it becomes a kind of national crime, and distinguishes us from all the Governments that lie about us. I cannot but look upon the finest strokes of satire, which are aimed at particular persons, and which are supported even with the appearances of truth, to be the marks of an evil mind, and highly criminal in themselves. Infamy, like other punishments, is under the direction and distribution of the Magistrate, and not of any private person. Accordingly we learn from a fragment of Cicero, that though there were very few capital punishments in the twelve tables, a libel or lampoon which took away the good name of another, was to be punished by death. But this is far from being our case. Our satyr is nothing but ribaldry and Bilinggate. Scurrility passes for wit; and he who can call names in the greatest variety of phrases, is looked upon to have the shrewdest pen. By this means the honour of families is ruined, the highest posts and greatest titles are rendered cheap and vile in the sight of the people; the noblest virtues, and most exalted parts, exposed to the contempt of the vicious and the ignorant. Should a foreigner, who knows nothing of our private factions, or one who is to act his part in the world, when our present heats and animosities are forgot, should I say, such an one form to himself a notion of the greatest men of all sides in the British nation, who are now living, from the characters which are given them in some or other of those abominable writings which are daily published among us, what a nation of monsters must we appear!

As this cruel practice tends to the utter subversion of all truth and humanity among us, it deserves the utmost detestation and discouragement of all who have either the love of their country, or the honour of their religion, at heart. I would therefore earnestly recommend it to the consideration of those who deal in these pernicious arts of writing; and of those who take pleasure in the reading of them. As for the first, I have spoken of them in former papers, and have not stuck to rank them with the murderer and assassin. Every honest man feels as high a value upon a good name, as upon life itself; and I cannot but think that those who privately assail the one, would destroy the other, might they do it with the same secrecy and impunity.
As for persons who take pleasure in the reading and digesting of such detestable libels, I am afraid they fall very little short of the guilt of the first composers. By a law of the Emperors Valentinian and Valens, it was made death for any person not only to write a libel, but if he met with one by chance, not to tear or burn it. But because I would not be thought singular in my opinion of this matter, I shall conclude my paper with the words of Monseur Bayle, who was a man of great freedom of thought, as well as of exquisite learning and judgment.

"I cannot imagine, that a man who diffuses a libel is less defirous of doing mischief than the Author himself. But what shall we say of the pleasure which a man takes in the reading of a defamatory libel? Is it not a heinous sin in the sight of God? We must distinguish in this point. This pleasure is either an agreeable sensation we are affected with, when we meet with a witty thought which is well expressed, or it is a joy which we conceive from the dishonour of the Person who is defamed. I will say nothing to the first of these cases; for perhaps some would think that my morality is not severe enough, if I should affirm that a man is not matter of those agreeable sensations, any more than of those occasioned by sugar or honey, when they touch his tongue; but as to the second, every one will own that pleasure to be a heinous sin. The pleasure in the first case is of no continuance; it prevents our reason and reflection, and may be immediately followed by a secret grief, to see our neighbour's honour blasted. If it does not cease immediately, it is a sign that we are not displeased with the ill-nature of the Satyr; but are glad to see him defame his enemy by all kinds of stories; and then we deserve the punishment to which the writer of the libel is subject. I shall here add the words of a modern Author, St. Gregory upon excommunicating those writers who had disdained Caliguris; does notExcept those who read their works; because, says he, if calumnies have always been the delight of the hearers, and a gratification of those persons who have no other advantage over honest men, as not he who takes pleasure in reading them as guilty as he who composed them? It is an uncontested maxim, that they who approve an action would certainly do it if they could; that is, if some reason of self-love did not hinder them. There is no difference, says Cicero, between advising a crime, and approving it when committed. The Roman law confirms this maxim, having subjected the Approvers and Authors of this evil to the same penalty. We may therefore conclude, that those who are pleased with reading defamatory libels, so far as to ap-"
"approve the authors and dispersers of them, are as guilty as if they had composed them; for if they do not write such libels themselves, it is because they have not the talent of writing, or because they will run no hazard.
The Author produces other authorities to confirm his judgment in this particular.

No. 452. Friday, August 8.

Here is no humour in my countrymen, which I am more inclined to wonder at, than their general thirst after news. There are about a dozen ingenious men, who live very plentifully upon this curiosity of their fellow-subjects. They all of them receive the same advices from abroad, and very often in the same words; but their way of cooking it is so different, that there is no citizen, who has an eye to the publick good, that can leave the Coffee-house with peace of mind, before he has given every one of them a reading. These several difies of news are so very agreeable to the palate of my countrymen, that they are not only pleased with them when they are served up hot, but when they are again set cold before them, by those penetrating Politicians, who oblige the publick with their reflections and observations upon every piece of intelligence that is sent us from abroad. The text is given us by one feat of writers, and the comment by another.

But notwithstanding we have the same tale told us in so many different papers, and if occasion requires in so many articles of the same paper; notwithstanding in a scarcity of foreign posts we hear the same story repeated, by different advices from Paris, Brussels, the Hague, and from every great town in Europe; notwithstanding the multitude of annotations, explanations, reflections, and various readings which it passes through, our time lies heavy on our hands till the arrival of a fresh Male:
we long to receive further particulars, to hear what will be the next step, or what will be the consequence of that which has been already taken.
A westerly wind keeps the whole town in suspense, and puts a stop to conversation.

This general curiosity has been raised and inflamed by our late wars, and it rightly directed, might be of good use to a person who has such a thrift awakened in him. Why should not a man, who takes delight in reading everything that is new, apply himself to history, travels, and other writings of the same kind, where he will find perpetual fuel for his curiosity, and meet with much more pleasure and improvement, than in these papers of the week? An honest tradesman, who languishes a whole summer in expectation of a battle, and perhaps is balked at last, may here meet with half a dozen in a day. He may read the news of a whole campaign, in less time than he now bestows upon the products of any single post. Fights, conquests and revolutions lye thick together. The Reader’s curiosity is raised and satisfied every moment, and his passions disappointed or gratified, without being detained in a state of uncertainty from day to day, or lying at the mercy of sea and wind. In short, the mind is not here kept in a perpetual gape after knowledge, nor punished with that eternal thirst, which is the portion of all our modern newsmongers and coffee-houfe politicians.

All matters of fact, which a man did not know before, are news to him; and I do not see how any haberdasher in Cheapside is more concerned in the present quarrel of the Cantons, than he was in that of the League. At least, I believe every one will allow me, it is of more importance to an Englishman to know the history of his ancestors, than that of his contemporaries, who live upon the banks of the Danneb or the Bohemian. As for those who are of another mind, I shall recommend to them the following Letter, from a Projector, who is willing to turn a penny by this remarkable curiosity of his countrymen.

Mr. Spectator,

"You must have observed, that men who frequent Coffee-houses, and delight in news, are pleased with every thing that is matter of fact, so it be what they have not heard before. A victory, or a defeat, are equally agreeable to them. The shutting of a Cardinal’s mouth pleases them one post, and the opening of it another. They are glad to hear the French court is removed to Mardi, and are afterwards as much delighted with its return to Versailles. They read the advertisements with the same curiosity as the articles of publick news; and are as pleased to hear of a pye-bald horse that is strayed out of a field..."
field near Islington, as of a whole troop that has been engaged in any foreign adventure. In short, they have a relish for every thing that is news, let the matter of it be what it will; or to speak more properly, they are men of a voracious appetite, but no taste. Now, Sir, since the great fountain of news, I mean the war, is very near being dried up; and since these Gentlemen have contracted such an inextinguishable thirst after it; I have taken their case and my own into consideration, and have thought of a project which may turn to the advantage of us both. I have thoughts of publishing a daily paper, which shall comprehend in it all the most remarkable occurrences in every little town, village and hamlet, that lie within ten miles of London, or in other words, within the verge of the penny-post. I have pitched upon this scene of intelligence for two reasons; first, because the carriage of Letters will be very cheap; and secondly, because I may receive them every day. By this means my Readers will have their news fresh and fresh, and many worthy citizens, who cannot sleep with any satisfaction at present, for want of being informed how the world goes, may go to bed contentedly, it being my design to put out my paper every night at nine o'clock precisely. I have already established correspondences in these several places, and received very good intelligence.

By my last advices from Knights-bridge I hear that a horse was clapped into the pound on the third instant, and that he was not released
when the Letters came away.

We are informed from Pankridge, that a dozen weddings were lately celebrated in the Mother Church of that place, but are referred to their next Letters for the names of the parties concerned.

Letters from Bromley advise, that the Widow Blight had received several visits from John Milde, which affords great matter of speculation in those parts.

By a Fisher-man which lately touched at Hammersmith, there is advice from Putney, that a certain person well known in that place, is like to lose his election for Church-warden; but this being boat-news, we cannot give entire credit to it.

Letters from Paddington bring little more than that William Squeak, the low-gelder, passed through that place the fifth instant.

They advise from Finsbury, that things remained there in the same date they were. They had intelligence, just as the Letters came away, of a tub of excellent ale just let abroad at Pembridge; but this wanted confirmation.
I have here, Sir, given you a specimen of the news with which I intend to entertain the town, and which, when drawn up regularly in the form of a News-paper, will, I doubt not, be very acceptable to many of those public-spirited Readers, who take more delight in acquainting themselves with other peoples business than their own. I hope a paper of this kind, which lets us know what is done near home, may be more useful to us, than those which are filled with advices from Zug and Bender, and make some amends for that dearth of intelligence, which we may justly apprehend from times of peace. If I find that you receive this project favourably, I will shortly trouble you with one or two more; and in the mean time am, most worthy Sir, with all due respect,

Your most obedient, and most humble Servant.

Non usitatâ nec tenui seri Penna—— Hor.

THERE is not a more pleasing exercise of the mind than Gratitude. It is accompanied with such an inward satisfaction, that the duty is sufficiently rewarded by the performance. It is not like the practice of many other virtues, difficult and painful, but attended with so much pleasure, that were there no positive command which enjoined it, nor any recompence laid up for it hereafter, a generous mind would indulge in it, for the natural gratification that accompanies it.

If Gratitude is due from man to man, how much more from man to his Maker? The Supreme Being does not only confer upon us those bounties which proceed more immediately from his hand, but even those benefits which are conveyed to us by others. Every blessing we enjoy, by what means soever it may be derived upon us, is the gift of him who is the great Author of Good, and Father of Mercies.

If Gratitude, when exerted towards one another, naturally produces a very pleasing sentiment in the mind of a grateful man; it exalts the soul into rapture, when it is employed on this great object of gratitude; on this beneficent Being who has given us every thing we already possess, and from whom we expect every thing we yet hope for.

Most of the works of the pagan Poets were either direct Hymns to their Deities, or tended indirectly to the celebration of their respective attributes and perfections. Those who are acquainted with the works of the Greek and Latin Poets which are still extant, will upon reflection find this observation so true, that I shall not enlarge upon it. One would wonder that more of our Christian Poets have not turned their thoughts this way, especially if we consider, that our idea of the Supreme Being is not only infinitely more great and noble that what could possibly enter into the heart of an heathen, but filled with every thing that can raise the imagination, and give an opportunity for the sublimest thoughts and conceptions.

Plutarch tells us of a heathen who was singing an Hymn to Diana, in which he celebrated her for her delight in human sacrifices, and other instances of cruelty and revenge; upon which a Poet who was present at this piece of devotion, and seems to have had a truer idea of the divine nature, told the votary by way of reproof, that in recompence for his Hymn, he heartily wished he might have a daughter of the same temper with the Goddess he celebrated. It was indeed impossible to write the praises of one of those false Deities, according to the pagan creed, without a mixture of impertinence and absurdity.

The Jews, who before the times of Christianity were the only people that had the knowledge of the true God, have fet the Christian world an example how they ought to employ this divine talent of which I am speaking. As that nation produced men of great genius, without considering them as inspired writers, they have transmitted to us many Hymns and divine Odes, which excel those that are delivered down to us by the ancient Greeks and Romans, in the poetry, as much as in the subject to which it was consecrated. This I think might easily be shewn, if there were occasion for it.

I have already communicated to the publick some pieces of divine poetry, and as they have met with a very favourable reception, I shall from time to time publish any work of the same nature which has not yet appeared in print, and may be acceptable to my Readers.
When all thy mercies, O my God,
My rising soul surveys:
Transported with the view, I'm lost
In wonder, love, and praise.

Oh how shall words with equal warmth
The Gratitude declare,
That glows within my ravish'd heart!
But thou canst read it there.

Thy providence my life sustain'd
And all my wants redress,
When in the silent womb I lay,
And hung upon the breast.

To all my weak complaints and cries
Thy mercy lent an ear,
E'er yet my feeble thoughts had learnt
To form themselves in prayer.

Unnumber'd comforts to my soul
Thy tender care bestow'd,
Before my infant heart conceiv'd
From whom these comforts flow'd.

When in the slip'ry paths of youth
With heedless steps I ran,
Thine arm unseen convey'd me safe
And led me up to man;

Through hidden dangers, toils, and deaths,
It gently clear'd my way,
And through the pleasing shades of vice,
More to be fear'd than they.
VIII.
When worn with sickness oft hast thou
With health renew'd my face,
And when in sins and sorrows sunk
Recover'd my soul with grace.

IX.
Thy bounteous hand with worldly bliss
Has made my cup run o'er,
And in a kind and faithful friend
Has doubled all my store.

X.
Ten thousand thousand precious gifts
My daily thanks employ,
Nor is the least a cheerful heart,
That tastes those gifts with joy.

XI.
Through ev'ry period of my life
Thy goodness I'll pursue,
And after death in distant worlds
The glorious theme renew.

XII.
When nature fails, and day and night
Divide thy works no more,
My ever-grateful heart, O Lord,
Thy mercy shall adore.

XIII.
Through all Eternity to thee
A joyful song I'll raise,
For oh! Eternity's too short
To utter all thy praise.

Thursday,
Shall this day lay before my Reader a letter, written by the same hand with that of last Friday, which contained proposals for a printed newspaper, that should take in the whole circle of the penny-post.

S I R,

THE kind reception you gave my last Friday's letter, in which I broached my project of a Newspaper, encourages me to lay before you two or three more; for, you must know, Sir, that we look upon you to be the Lowestes of the learned world, and cannot think any scheme practicable or rational before you have approved of it, though all the money we raise by it is on our own funds, and for our private use.

I have often thought that a Newspaper of Whispers, written every post, and sent about the kingdom, after the same manner as that of Mr. Dyer, Mr. Dawkes, or any other epistolary Historian, might be highly gratifying to the publick, as well as beneficial to the Author. By whispers I mean those pieces of news which are communicated as secrets, and which bring a double pleasure to the hearer; first, as they are private history, and in the next place, as they have always in them a dash of scandal. These are the two chief qualifications in an article of News, which recommend it, in a more than ordinary manner, to the ears of the curious. Sicknels of persons in high posts, twilight visits paid and received by Ministers of State, clandestine courtships and marriages, secret amours, losties at play, applications for places, with their respective success or repulses, are the materials in which I chiefly intend to deal. I have two persons, that are each of them the representative of a species, who are to furnish me with those whispers which I intend to convey to my correspondents. The first of these is Peter H左ss, descended from the ancient family of the Husbes. The other is the old Lady Blaff, who has a very numerous tribe of daughters in the two great cities of London and W...
Westminster. Peter Husb has a whispering hole in most of the great Coffee-houses about town. If you are alone with him in a wide room, he carries you up into a corner of it, and speaks in your ear. I have seen Peter feit himself in a company of seven or eight persons, whom however saw before in his life; and after having looked about to see there was no one that over-heard him, has communicated to them in a low voice, and under the seal of secrecy, the death of a great man in the country, who was perhaps a fox-hunting the very moment this account was giving of him. If upon your entering into a Coffee-house you see a circle of heads bending over the table, and lying close by one another, it is ten to one but my friend Peter is among them. I have known Peter publishing the whisper of the day by eight a clock in the morning at Garraway's, by twelve at Will's, and before two at the Smyrna. When Peter has thus effectually launched a secret, I have been very well pleased to hear people whispering it to one another at second hand, and spreading it about as their own; for you must know, Sir, the great incentive to whispering is the ambition which every one has of being thought in the secret, and being looked upon as a man who has access to greater people than one would imagine. After having given you this account of Peter Husb, I proceed to that virtuous lady, the old Lady Blaft, who is to communicate to me the private transactons of the Crimp table, with all the Arcana of the fair sex. The Lady Blaft, you must understand, has such a particular malignity in her whisper, that it blights like an easterly wind, and withers every reputation that it breathes upon. She has a particular knack at making private weddings, and last winter married above five women of Quality to their footmen. Her whisper can make an innocent young woman big with child, or fill an healthful young fellow with distemper that are not to be named. She can turn a visit into an intrigue, and a diffident suit into an assigation. She can beggar the wealthy, and degrade the noble. In short, she can whisper men base and foolish, jealous or ill-natured, or, if occasion requires, can tell you the flaps of their great grandmothers, and traduce the memory of honest coach-men that have been in their graves above these hundred years. By these, and the like helps, I question not but I shall furnish out a very handsom News-letter. If you approve my project, I shall begin to whisper by the very next post, and question not but every one of my customers will be very well pleased with me, when he considers that every piece of news I send him is a word in his ear, and lets him into a secret.

Having
Having given you a sketch of this project, I shall, in the next place, suggest to you another for a monthly pamphlet, which I shall likewise submit to your spectatorial wisdom. I need not tell you, Sir, that there are several Authors in France, Germany and Holland, as well as in our own country, who publish every month, what they call An Account of the Works of the Learned, in which they give us an abstract of all such books as are printed in any part of Europe. Now, Sir, it is my design to publish every month, An Account of the Works of the Unlearned. Several late productions of my own country-men, who many of them make a very eminent figure in the illiterate world, encourage me in this undertaking. I may, in this work, possibly make a review of several pieces which have appeared in the foreign Accounts above-mentioned, though they ought not to have been taken notice of in works which bear such a title. I may, likewise, take into consideration such pieces as appear from time to time, under the names of those Gentlemen who compliment one another, in publick Assemblies, by the title of the Learned Gentlemen. Our Party-authors will also afford me a great variety of subjects, not to mention Editors, Commentators, and others, who are often men of no learning, or what is as bad, of no knowledge. I shall not enlarge upon this hint; but if you think any thing can be made of it, I shall set about it with all the pains and application that so useful a work deserves.

I am ever, most worthy Sir, &c.

Ados ἐν ἀϋθος

Pudor matus

Hef.

Hor.

I could not but smile at the account that was yesterday given me of a modest young Gentleman, who being invited to an entertainment, though he was not used to drink, had not the confidence to refuse his glass in his turn, when on a sudden he grew so fluttered that he took all the talk of the table into his own hands, abusing every one of the company.
pany, and flung a bottle at the Gentleman's head who treated him. This has given me occasion to reflect upon the ill effects of a vicious modesty, and to remember the saying of Brutus, as it is quoted by Plutarch, that the person has had but an ill education, who has not been taught to deny any thing. This false kind of modesty has, perhaps, betrayed both sexes into as many vices as the most abandoned impudence, and is the more inexcusable to Reason, because it acts to gratify others rather than itself, and is punished with a kind of remorse, not only like other vicious habits when the crime is over, but even at the very time that it is committed.

Nothing is more amiable than true modesty, and nothing is more contemptible than the false. The one guards virtue, the other betrays it. True modesty is ashamed to do any thing that is repugnant to the rules of right reason: false modesty is ashamed to do any thing that is opposite to the humour of the company. True modesty avoids every thing that is criminal, false modesty every thing that is unashionable. The latter is only a general undetermined instinct; the former is that instinct, limited and circumscribed by the rules of prudence and religion.

We may conclude that modesty to be false and vicious, which engages a man to do any thing that is ill or indiscreet, or which restrains him from doing any that is of a contrary nature. How many men, in the common concerns of life, lend sums of money which they are not able to spare, are bound for persons whom they have but little friendship for, give recommendatory characters of men whom they are not acquainted with, bel ow places on those whom they do not esteem, live in such a manner as they themselves do not approve, and all this merely because they have not the confidence to resist solicitation, importunity, or example?

Nor does this false modesty expose us only to such actions as are indiscreet, but very often to such as are highly criminal. When Xenophanes was called timorous, because he would not venture his money in a game at dice: I confess, said he, that I am exceeding timorous, for I dare not do an ill thing. On the contrary, a man of vicious modesty complies with every thing, and is only fearful of doing what may look singular in the company where he is engaged. He falls in with the torrent, and lets himself go to every action or discourse, however unjustifiable in itself, so it be in vogue among the present party. This, though one of the most common, is one of the most ridiculous dispositions in human nature, that men should not be ashamed of speaking or acting in a disolute or irrational manner, but that one who is in their company should be ashamed of governing himself by the principles of reason and virtue.
In the second place, we are to consider false modesty, as it restrains a man from doing what is good and laudable. My Reader's own thoughts will suggest to him many instances and examples under this head. I shall only dwell upon one reflection, which I cannot make without a secret concern. We have in England a particular bashfulness in every thing that regards religion. A well-bred man is obliged to conceal any serious sentiment of this nature, and very often to appear a greater libertine than he is, that he may keep himself in countenance among the men of mode. Our excess of modesty makes us shame-faced in all the exercises of piety and devotion. This humour prevails upon us daily; insomuch, that at many well-bred tables, the matter of the house is so very modest a man, that he has not the confidence to say grace at his own table: a custom which is not only practised by all the nations about us, but was never omitted by the heathens themselves. English Gentlemen who travel into Roman Catholic countries, are not a little surprized to meet with people of the best quality kneeling in their Churches, and engaged in their private devotions, though it be not at the hours of public worship. An Officer of the army, or a man of wit and pleasure in those countries, would be afraid of passing not only for an irreligious, but an ill-bred man, should he be seen to go to bed, or sit down at table, without offering up his devotions on such occasions. The same show of religion appears in all the foreign reformed Churches, and enters so much into their ordinary conversation, that an Englishman is apt to term them hypocritical and precise.

This little appearance of a religious deportment in our nation, may proceed in some measure from that modesty which is natural to us, but the great occasion of it is certainly this. Those swarms of fanatics that over-ran the nation in the time of the great rebellion, carried their hypocrisy so high, that they had converted our whole language into a jargon of enthusiasm; insomuch that upon the Restoration men thought they could not recede too far from the behaviour and practice of those persons, who had made religion a cloak to so many villanies. This led them into the other extreme, every appearance of devotion was looked upon as puritanical; and falling into the hands of the ridiculers who flourished in that reign, and attacked everything that was serious, it has ever since been out of countenance among us. By this means we are gradually fallen into that vicious modesty which has in some measure worn out from among us the appearance of Christianity in ordinary life and conversation, and which distinguishes us from all our neighbours.
Hypocrite cannot indeed be too much detested, but at the same time is to be preferred to open impiety. They are both equally destructive to the person who is polluted with them; but in regard to others, hypocrisy is not so pernicious as bare-faced irreligion. The due mean to be observed is to be sincerely virtuous, and at the same time to let the world see we are so. I do not know a more dreadful menace in the holy writings, than that which is pronounced against those who have this perverted modesty, to be ashamed before men in a particular of such unspeakable importance.

------ quicquid dignum sapienti bonoque est. Hor.

RELIGION may be considered under two general heads. The first comprehends what we are to believe, the other what we are to practice. By those things which we are to believe, I mean whatever is revealed to us in the holy writings, and which we could not have obtained the knowledge of by the light of nature; by the things which we are to practice, I mean all those duties to which we are directed by reason or natural religion. The first of these I shall distinguish by the name of Faith, the second by that of Morality.

If we look into the more serious part of mankind, we find many who lay too great a stress upon Faith, that they neglect Morality; and many who build too much upon Morality, that they do not pay a due regard to Faith. The perfect man should be defective in neither of these particulars, as will be very evident to those who consider the benefits which arise from each of them, and which I shall make the subject of this day's paper.

Notwithstanding this general division of christian duty into Morality and Faith, and that they have both their peculiar excellencies, the first has the pre-eminence in several respects.

First, Because the greatest part of morality (as I have stated the notion of it,) is of a fixed eternal nature, and will endure when faith shall fail, and be lost in conviction.
Secondly, Because a person may be qualified to do greater good to mankind, and become more beneficial to the world, by morality without faith, than by faith without morality.

Thirdly, Because morality gives a greater perfection to human nature, by quieting the mind, moderating the passions, and advancing the happiness of every man in his private capacity.

Fourthly, Because the rule of morality is much more certain than that of faith, all the civilized nations of the world agreeing in the great points of morality, as much as they differ in those of faith.

Fifthly, Because infidelity is not so malignant a nature as immorality; or to put the same reason in another light, because it is generally owned, there may be salvation for a virtuous infidel, (particularly in the case of invincible ignorance) but none for a vicious believer.

Sixthly, Because faith seems to draw its principal, if not all its excellence, from the influence it has upon morality; as we shall see more at large, if we consider wherein consists the excellency of faith, or the belief of revealed religion; and this I think is,

First, In explaining and carrying to greater heights, several points of morality.

Secondly, In furnishing new and stronger motives to enforce the practice of morality.

Thirdly, In giving us more amiable ideas of the Supreme Being, more endearing notions of one another, and a truer state of ourselves, both in regard to the grandeur and wileness of our natures.

Fourthly, By shewing us the blackness and deformity of vice, which in the christian system is so very great, that he who is possessed of all perfection and the sovereign judge of it, is represented by several of our Divines as hating sin to the same degree that he loves the Sacred Person who was made the Propitiation of it.

Fifthly, In being the ordinary and prescribed method of making morality effectual to salvation.

I have only touched on these several heads, which every one who is conversant in discourses of this nature will easily enlarge upon in his own thoughts, and draw conclusions from them which may be useful to him in the conduct of his life. One I am sure is so obvious, that he cannot miss it, namely that a man cannot be perfect in his scheme of morality, who does not strengthen and support it with that of the christian faith.

Besides this, I shall lay down two or three other maxims which I think we may deduce from what has been said.

First,
First, That we should be particularly cautious of making anything an article of faith, which does not contribute to the confirmation or improvement of morality.

Secondly, That no article of faith can be true and authentic, which weakens or subverts the practical part of religion, or what I have hitherto called Morality.

Thirdly, That the greatest friend of morality, or natural religion, cannot possibly apprehend any danger from embracing Christianity, as it is preferred pure and uncorrupt in the doctrines of our national Church.

There is likewise another maxim which I think may be drawn from the foregoing considerations, which is this, that we should in all dubious points consider any ill consequences that may arise from them, supposing they should be erroneous, before we give up our assent to them.

For example, In that disputable point of Persecuting men for conscience sake, besides the imbittering their minds with hatred, indignation, and all the vehemence of resentment, and enflaming them to profess what they do not believe; we cut them off from the pleasures and advantages of society, afflict their bodies, distress their fortunes, hurt their reputations, ruin their families, make their lives painful, or put an end to them. Sure when I see such dreadful consequences arising from a principle, I would as fully convinced of the truth of it, as of a mathematical demonstration, before I would venture to act upon it, or make it a part of my religion.

In this case the injury done our neighbour is plain and evident, the principle that puts us upon doing it, of a dubious and disputable nature. Morality seems highly violated by the one, and whether or no a Zeal for what a man thinks the true system of faith may justify it, is very uncertain. I cannot but think, if our religion produce Charity as well as Zeal, it will not be for shewing it self by such cruel insinuations. But, to conclude with the words of an excellent Author, We have just enough religion to make us hate, but not enough to make us love one another.

I was lately entertaining my self with comparing Homer's balance, in which Jupiter is represented as weighing the fates of Heëtor and Achilles, with a passage of Virgil, wherein that Deity is introduced as weighing the fates of Turnus and Æneas. I then considered how the same way of thinking prevailed in the eastern parts of the world, as in those noble passages of Scripture, where we are told, that the great King of Babylon, the day before his death, had been weighed in the balance, and been found wanting. In other places of the holy writings, the Almighty is described as weighing the mountains in scales, making the weight for the winds, knowing the ballancings of the clouds, and, in others, as weighing the actions of men, and laying their calamities together in a balance. Milton, as I have observed in a former paper, had an eye to several of these foregoing instances, in that beautiful description wherein he represents the Arch-Angel and the evil Spirit as addressing themselves for the combat, but parted by the balance which appeared in the heavens, and weighed the consequences of such a battle.

To Eternal to prevent such horrid fray,
Hung forth in heaven his golden scales, yet seen Between Ætna and the Scorpion sign,
Wherein all things created first be weigh'd,

The
The pendulous round earth, with balanc'd air
In counterpoise, now ponders all events;
Battles and realms; in these he puts two weights
The sequel each of parting and of fight:
The latter quick up flew, and kick'd the beam;
Which Gabriel flying, thus bespake the fiend.

Satan I know thy strength, and thou know'st mine;
Neither our own but given: what folly then
To boast what arms can do, since thine no more Than Heav'n permits, nor mine, though doubled more
To trample thee as mire: for proof look up,
And read thy lot in yon celestial Sign,
Where thou art weigh'd, and shown, how light, how weak;
If thou resist. The fiend look'd up, and knew
His mounted scale aloft; nor more, but fled Murm'ring, and with him fled the shades of night.

These several amusing thoughts having taken possession of my mind some time before I went to sleep, and mingling themselves with my ordinary ideas, roused in my imagination a very odd kind of vision. I was, no thought, replaced in my study, and seated in my elbow chair, where I had indulged the foregoing speculations, with my lamp burning by me, as usual. Whilst I was here meditating on several subjects of Morality, and considering the nature of many virtues and vices, as materials for those discourses with which I daily entertain the public; I saw, methought, a pair of golden scales hanging by a chain in the same metal over the table that stood before me; when, on a sudden, there were great heaps of weights thrown down on each side of them. I found upon examining these weights, they shewed the value of every thing that is in esteem among men. I made an essay of them, by putting the weight of wisdom in one scale, and that of riches in another, upon which the latter, to shew its comparative lightness, immediately flew up and kick'd the beam.

But, before I proceed, I must inform my Reader, that these weights did not exert their natural gravity, till they were laid in the golden balance, insomuch that I could not guess which was light or heavy, whilst I held them in my hand. This I found by several instances; for upon laying a weight in one of the scales, which was inscribed by the word

Eternity; though I threw in that of time, prosperity, affliction, wealth, poverty,

poverty, interest, success, with many other weights, which in my hand seemed very ponderous, they were not able to stir the opposite balance, nor could they have prevailed, though assisted with the weight of the sun, the stars, and the earth.

Upon emptying the scales, I laid several titles and honours, with pomp, triumphs, and many weights of the like nature, in one of them, and seeing a little glittering weight lie by me, I threw it accidentally into the other scale, when, to my great surprise, it proved so exactly a counterpoise, that it kept the balance in an equilibrium. This little glittering weight was inscribed upon the edges of it with the word Vanity. I found there were several other weights which were equally heavy, and exact counterpoises to one another; a few of them I tried, as avarice and poverty, riches and content, with some others.

There were likewise several weights that were of the fame figure, and seemed to correspond with each other, but were entirely different when thrown into the scales, as religion and hypocrisy, pedantry and learning, wit and vivacity, superstition and devotion, gravity and wisdom, with many others.

I observed one particular weight lettered on both sides, and upon applying my self to the reading of it, I found on one side written, In the Dialect of Men, and underneath it, CALAMITIES; on the other side was written, In the Language of the Gods, and underneath, BLESSINGS. I found the intrinsic value of this weight to be much greater than I imagined, for it overpowered health, wealth, good-fortune, and many other weights, which were much more ponderous in my hand than the other.

There is a saying among the Scotch, that an ounce of Mother is worth a pound of Clergy; I was sensible of the truth of this saying, when I saw the difference between the weight of natural parts, and that of learning. The observation which I made upon these two weights opened to me a new field of discoveries, for notwithstanding the weight of natural parts was much heavier than that of learning; I observed that it weighed an hundred times heavier than it did before, when I put learning into the same scale with it. I made the same observation upon Faith and Morality; for notwithstanding the latter out-weighed the former separately, it received a thousand times more additional weight from its conjunction with the former, than what it had by itself. This odd Phenomenon showed it self in other particulars, as in wit and judgment, philosophy and religion, justice and humanity, zeal and charity, depth of sense and perception, pericipuilty of style, with innumerable other particulars, too long to be mentioned in this paper.

As a dream seldom fails of dashing seriousness with impertinence, mirth with gravity, methought I made several other experiments of a more ludicrous nature, by one of which I found that an English Octavo was very often heavier than a French Folio; and by another, that an old Greek or Latin Author weighed down a whole library of moderns. Seeing one of my Spectators lying by me, I laid it into one of the scales, and hung a two-penny piece into the other. The Reader will not enquire into the event, if he remembers the first trial which I have recorded in this paper. I afterwards threw both the sexes into the balance; but as it is not for my interest to disoblige either of them, I shall desire to be excused from telling the result of this experiment. Having an opportunity of this nature in my hands, I could not forbear throwing into one scale the principles of a Tory, and in the other those of a Whig; but as I have all along declared this to be a neutral paper, I shall likewise desire to be silent under this head also, though upon examining one of the weights, I saw the word TEKEL engraven on it in capital letters.

I made many other experiments, and though I have not room for them all in this day's Speculation, I may perhaps refer them for another. I shall only add, that upon my awaking I was sorry to find my golden scales vanished, but resolved for the future to learn this lesson from them, not to deferee or value any things for their appearances, but to regulate my eteme and passions towards them according to their real and intrinsic value.

Am wonderfully pleased when I meet with any passage in an old Greek or Latin Author, that is not blown upon, and which I have never met with in any quotation. Of this kind is a beautiful saying in Theognis: Vice is covered by wealth, and virtue by poverty; or to give it in the verbal translation, Among men there are some who have their vices concealed by wealth, and others who have their virtues concealed by poverty.

Every man's observation will supply him with instances of rich men, who have several faults and defects that are overlooked, if not entirely hidden, by means of their riches; and, I think, we cannot find a more natural description of a poor man, whose merits are lost in his poverty, than that in the words of the wise man. There was a little city, and few men within it; and there came a great King against it, and besieged it, and built great bulwarks against it. Now there was found in it a poor wise man, and he, by his wisdom, delivered the city; yet no man remembered that same poor man. Then said I, Wisdom is better than strength; nevertheless, the poor man's wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard.

The middle condition seems to be the most advantageously situated for the gaining of wisdom. Poverty turns our thoughts too much upon the supplying of our wants, and riches upon enjoying our superfluities; and, as Cowley has said in another case, It is hard for a man to keep a steady eye upon truth, who is always in a battle or a triumph.

If we regard poverty and wealth, as they are apt to produce vices or virtues in the mind of man, one may observe, that there is a set of each of these growing out of poverty, quite different from that which rises out of wealth. Humility and patience, industry and temperance, are very often... ten the good qualities of a poor man. Humanity and good-nature, magnanimity, and a sense of honour, are as often the qualifications of the rich. On the contrary, poverty is apt to betray a man into envy, riches into arrogance. Poverty is too often attended with fraud, vicious compliance, repining, murmur and discontent. Riches expose a man to pride and luxury, a foolish elation of heart, and too great a fondness for the present world. In short, the middle condition is most eligible to the man who would improve himself in virtue; as I have before shown, it is the most advantageous for the gaining of knowledge. It was upon this consideration that Agur founded his prayer, which for the wisdom of it is recorded in holy Writ. Two things have I required of thee, deny me them not before I dye. Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty, nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me. Left I be full and deny thee; and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor and fain, and take the name of my God in vain.

I shall fill the remaining part of my paper with a very pretty allegory, which is wrought into a Play by Aristophanes the Greek Comedian. It seems originally designed as a satyr upon the rich, though, in some parts of it, it is like the foregoing discourse, a kind of comparison between wealth and poverty.

Chremylus, who was an old and a good man, and withal exceeding poor, being defirous to leave some riches to his son, consults the oracle of Apollo upon the subject. The oracle bids him follow the first man he should see upon his going out of the Temple. The person he chance to see was to appearance an old fordid blind man, but upon his following him from place to place, he at last found by his own confession, that he was Plutus the god of Riches, and that he was just come out of the house of a miser. Plutus further told him, that when he was a boy he used to declare, that as soon as he came to age he would distribute wealth to none but virtuous and just men; upon which Jupiter, considering the pernicious consequences of such a resolution, took his flight away from him, and left him to stroll about the world in the blind condition wherein Chremylus beheld him. With much ado Chremylus prevailed upon him to go to his house, where he met an old woman in a tattered raiment, who had been his guest for many years, and whose name was Poverty. The old woman refusing to turn out so easily as he would have her, he threatened to banish her not only from his own house, but out of all Greece, if she made any more words upon the matter. Poverty, on this occasion pleads her cause very notably, and represents to her old landlord, that she be driven out of the country, all their trades, arts and sciences would be driven out with her; and that if every one was rich, they would never be supplied with those pompous, ornaments and conveniences of life which made riches desirable. She likewise represented to him the several advantages which she bestowed upon her votaries; in regard to their shape, their health, and their activity, by preserving them from gouts, dropsies, unwieldiness and intemperance. But whatever she had to say for her self, she was at last forced to troop off.
Chremylus immediately considered how he might restore Platus to his ight; and in order to it conveyed him to the Temple of Asculapius, who was famous for cures and miracles of this nature. By this means the Deity recovered his eyes, and begun to make a right use of them, by enriching every one that was distinguished by piety towards the Gods, and justice towards men; and at the same time by taking away his gifts from the impious and undeserving. This produces several merry incidents, still in the last Act Mercury descends with great complaints from the Gods, that since the good men were grown rich, they had received no sacrifices, which is confirmed by a Priest of Jupiter, who enters with a remonstrance, that since this late innovation he was reduced to a starving condition, and could not live upon his office. Chremylus, who, in the beginning of the Play was religious in his life, concludes it with a proposal which was relished by all the good men who were now grown rich as well as himself, that they should carry Platus in a solemn procession to the Temple, and install him in the place of Jupiter. This allegory instructed the Athenians in two points: first, as it vindicated the conduct of providence in its ordinary distributions of wealth; and in the next place, as it shewed the great tendency of riches to corrupt the mor-rals of those who possessed them.
Having endeavoured in my last Saturday's paper to shew the great excellency of Faith, I shall here consider what are the proper means of strengthening and confirming it in the mind of man. Those who delight in reading books of controversy, which are written on both sides of the question in points of Faith, do very seldom arrive at a fixed and settled habit of it. They are one day entirely convinced of its important truths, and the next meet with something that shakes and disturbs them. The doubt which was laid revives again, and shews itself in new difficulties, and that generally for this reason, because the mind which is perpetually tost in controversies and disputes, is apt to forget the reasons which had once set it at rest, and to be disquieted with any former perplexity, when it appears in a new shape, or is started by a different hand. As nothing is more laudable than an enquiry after Truth, so nothing is more irrational than to pass away our whole lives, without determining our selves one way or other in those points which are of the last importance to us. There are indeed many things from which we may with-hold our assent; but in cases by which we are to regulate our lives, it is the greatest absurdity to be wavering and unsettled, without closing with that side which appears the most safe and the most probable. The first rule therefore which I shall lay down is this, that when by reading or discourse we find our selves thoroughly convinced of the truth of any article, and of the reasonableness of our belief in it, we should never after suffer our selves to call it into question. We may perhaps forget the arguments which occasioned our conviction, but we ought to remember the strength they had with us, and therefore still to retain the conviction which they once produced. This is no more than what we
we do in every common art or science, nor is it possible to act otherwise, considering the weakness and limitation of our intellectual faculties. It was thus that Latimer, one of the glorious army of Martyrs who introduced the reformation in England, behaved himself in that great conference which was managed between the most learned among the Protestants and Papists in the reign of Queen Mary. This venerable old man knowing how his abilities were impaired by age, and that it was impossible for him to recollect all those reasons which had directed him in the choice of his religion, left his companions who were in the full possession of their parts and learning, to baffle and confound their antagonists by the force of reason. As for himself: he only repeated to his adversaries the articles in which he firmly believed, and in the profession of which he was determined to die. It is in this manner that the mathematician proceeds upon propositions which he has once demonstrated; and though the demonstration may have slipped out of his memory, he builds upon the truth, because he knows it was demonstrated. This rule is absolutely necessary for weaker minds, and in some measure for men of the greatest abilities; but to these last I would propose, in the second place, that they should lay up in their memories, and always keep by them in a readiness, those arguments which appear to them of the greatest strength, and which cannot be got over by all the doubts and cavils of infidelity.

But, in the third place, there is nothing which strengthens faith more than morality. Faith and morality naturally produce each other. A man is quickly convinced of the truth of religion, who finds it is not against his interest that it should be true. The pleasure he receives at present, and the happiness which he promises himself from it hereafter, will both dispose him very powerfully to give credit to it, according to the ordinary observation that we are eager to believe what we wish. It is very certain, that a man of sound reason cannot forbear closeting with religion upon an impartial examination of it; but at the same time it is as certain, that faith is kept alive in us, and gathers strength from practice more than from speculation.

There is still another method which is more persuasive than any of the former, and that is an habitual adoration of the Supreme Being, as well in constant acts of mental worship, as in outward forms. The devout man does not only believe but feels there is a Deity. He has actual sensations of him; his experience concurs with his reason; he feels him more and more in all his intercourse with him, and even in this life almost loses his faith in conviction.
The last method which I shall mention for the giving life to man's faith, is frequent retirement from the world, accompanied with religious meditation. When a man thinks of any thing in the darkness of the night, whatever deep impressions it may make in his mind, they are apt to vanish as soon as the day breaks about him. The light and noise of the day, which are perpetually soliciting his senses, and calling off his attention, wear out of his mind the thoughts that imprinted themselves in it, with so much strength, during the silence and darkness of the night. A man finds the same difference as to himself in a crowd and in a solitude: the mind is flummoxed and dazzled amidst the variety of objects which press upon her in a great city: she cannot apply her self to the consideration of those things which are of the utmost concern to her. The cares or pleasures of the world strike in with every thought, and a multitude of vicious examples give a kind of justification to our folly. In our retirements, every thing dippes us to be serious. In courts and cities we are entertained with the works of men; in the country with those of God. One is the province of art, the other of nature. Faith and devotion naturally grow in the mind of every reasonable man, who sees the impressions of divine power and wisdom in every object, on which he calls his eye. The Supreme Being has made the best arguments for his own existence, in the formation of the heavens and the earth, and these are arguments which a man of sense cannot forbear attending to, who is out of the noise and hurry of human affairs. Aristotle says, that should a man live under ground, and there converse with the works of art and mechanism, and should afterwards be brought up into the open day, and see the several glories of the heaven and earth, he would immediately pronounce them the works of such a Being as we define God to be. The Psalmist has very beautiful strokes of poetry to this purpose; in that exalted strain, The heavens declare the glory of God: and the firmament showeth his handy-work. One day telleth another: and one night certifyeth another. There is neither speech nor language: but their voices are heard among them. Their sound is gone into all lands: and their words into the ends of the world. As such a bold and sublime manner of thinking furnishes very noble matter for an Ode, the Reader may see it wrought into the following one.

I.

The sparious' firmament on high,
With all the blue ethereal sky,
And spangled heavens, a shining frame,
Their great Original proclaims:
To unceasing sun, from day to day,
Does his Creator's power display,
And publishes to every land
The work of an Almighty hand.

II.

Soon as the evening shades prevail,
The moon takes up the wondrous tale,
And nightly to the listening earth
Repeats the story of her birth:
Whilst all the stars that round her burn,
And all the planets, in their turn,
Confirm the tidings as they roll,
And spread the truth, from pole to pole.

III.

What though, in solemn silence, all
Move round the dark terrestrial ball?
What the nor real voice nor sound
Amid their radiant orbs be found?
In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice,
For ever singing, as they shine,
"The hand that made us is divine.

Thursday,
I am persuaded there are few men, of generous principles, who would seek after great places, were it not rather to have an opportunity in their hands of obliging their particular friends, or those whom they look upon as men of worth, than to procure wealth and honour for themselves. To an honest mind the best perquisites of a place are the advantages it gives a man of doing good.

Those who are under the great Officers of State, and are the instruments by which they act, have more frequent opportunities for the exercise of compassion, and benevolence, than their Superiors themselves. These men know every little case that is to come before the great man, and if they are possessed with honest minds, will consider poverty as a recommendation in the person who applies himself to them, and make the justice of his cause the most powerful Solicitor in his behalf. A man of this temper, when he is in a post of business, becomes a blessing to the public: he patronizes the orphan and the widow, afflicts the friendless, and guides the ignorant: he does not reject the person's pretensions, who does not know how to explain them, or refuse doing a good office for a man because he cannot pay the fee of it. In short, though he regulates himself in all his proceedings by justice and equity, he finds a thousand occasions for all the good-natured offices of generosity and compassion.

A man is unfit for such a place of trust, who is of a flatter untractable nature, or has any other passion that makes him uneasy to those who approach him. Roughness of temper is apt to discourage the timorous or modest. The proud man discourages those from approaching him, who are of a mean condition, and who most want his assistance. The impatient man will not give himself time to be informed of the matter that lies before him. An Officer with one or more of these unbecoming qualities, is sometimes looked upon as a proper person to keep off impertinence and solicitation from his superior; but this is a kind of merit, that can never atone for the injustice which may very often arise from it.

There are two other vicious qualities which render a man very unfit for such a place of trust. The first of these is a dilatory temper, which commits innumerable cruelties without design. The maxim which several have laid down for a man’s conduct in ordinary life, should be inviolable with a man in office, never to think of doing that to-morrow which may be done to-day. A man who defers doing what ought to be done, is guilty of injustice so long as he defers it. The dispatch of a good of-vice is very often as beneficial to the solicitor as the good office it self.
In short, if a man compared the inconveniencies which another suffers by his delays, with the trifling motives and advantages which he himself may reap by such a delay, he would never be guilty of a fault which very often does an irreparable prejudice to the person who depends upon him, and which might be remedied with little trouble to himself.

But in the last place, there is no man so improper to be employed in business, as he who is in any degree capable of corruption; and such an one is the man, who upon any pretence whatsoever, receives more than what is the flated and unquestioned fee of his office. Gratifications, tokens of thankfulness, dispatch money, and the like insidious terms, are the pretences under which corruption very frequently shelters it self. An honest man will however look on all these methods as unjustifiable, and will enjoy himself better in a moderate fortune that is gained with honour and reputation, than in an over-grown estate that is cankered with the acquisitions of rapine and exaction. Were all our offices discharged with such an inflexible integrity, we should not see men in all ages, who grow up to exorbitant wealth with the abilities which are to be met with in an ordinary mechanic. I cannot but think that such a corruption proceeds chiefly from men employing the first that offer themselves, or those who have the character of shrewd worldly men, instead of searching out such as have had a liberal education, and have been trained up in the studies of knowledge and virtue.

It has been observed, that men of learning who take to business, discharge it generally with greater honesty than men of the world. The chief reason for it I take to be as follows. A man that has spent his youth in reading, has been used to find virtue extolled, and vice stigmatized. A man that has past his time in the world, has often seen vice triumphant, and virtue discomfited. Extortion, rapine and injustice, which are branded with infamy in books, often give a man a figure in the world; while several qualities which are celebrated in Authors, as generosity, ingenuity and good-nature, impoverish and ruin him. This cannot but have a proportionable effect on men, whose tempers and principles are equally good and vicious.

There would be at least this advantage in employing men of learning and parts in business, that their prosperity would set more gracefully on them, and that we should not see many worthless persons shoot up into the greatest figures of life.

No. 470. Friday, August 29.

Turpe est difficiles habere nugas,

Mart.

I have been very often disappointed of late years, when upon examining the new edition of a Classic Author, I have found above half the volume taken up with various readings. When I have expected to meet with a learned note upon a doubtful passage in a Latin Poet, I have been only informed, that such or such ancient Manuscripts for an et write an ae, or of some other notable discovery of the like importance. Indeed, when every reading gives us a different sense, or a new elegance in an Author, the Editor does very well in taking notice of it; but when he only entertains us with the several ways of spelling the same word, and gathers together the various blunders and mistakes of twenty or thirty different transcribers, they only take up the time of the learned Reader, and puzzle the minds of the ignorant. I have often fancied with my self how enraged an old Latin Author would be, should he see the several absurdities in sense and grammar, which are imputed to him by some or other of these various readings. In one he speaks nonfenes: in another makes use of a word that was never heard of: and indeed there there is scarce a foeticism in writing which the best Author is not guilty of, if we may be at liberty to read him in the words of some Manuscript, which the laborious Editor has thought fit to examine in the prosecution of his work.

I question not but the Ladies and pretty fellows will be very curious to understand what it is that I have been hitherto talking of. I shall therefore give them a notion of this practice, by endeavouring to write after the manner of several persons who make an eminent figure in the republick of letters. To this end we will suppose, that the following Song is an old Ode which I present to the public in a new edition, with the several various readings which I find of it in former editions, and in ancient Manuscripts. Those who cannot relish the various readings, will perhaps find their account in the Song, which never before appeared in print.

My love was fickle once and changing,
Nor e'er would settle in my heart;
From beauty still to beauty ranging,
In every face I found a dart.

'Twas first a charming shape enflav'd me,
An eye then gave the fatal stroke:
'Till by her wit Corinna saw'd me,
And all my former fetters broke.

But now a long and lasting anguish
For Belvidera I endure;
Hourly I sigh and hourly languish,
Nor hope to find the wanted cure.

For here the false unconstant lover,
After a thousand beauties shown,
Does new surprising charms discover,
And finds variety in one.

Various Readings.
Stanza the first, verse the first. And changing.] The and in some Manuscripts is written thus, &; but that in the Cotton Library writes it in three distinct letters.
Verse the second. Nor e'er would.] Aldus reads it ever would; but as this would hurt the metre, we have restored it to its genuine readings.
D d d 2
by observing that Synderes which had been neglected by ignorant transcribers.

[Ibid. In my heart.] Scaliger, and others, on my heart.

Verfe the second. I found a dart.] The Vatican Manuscript for I reads it, but this must have been the hallucination of the transcriber, who probably mistook the dash of the I for a T.

Stanza the second, Verfe the second. The fatal stroke.] Scipio, Salmasius, and many others, for the read a, but I have stuck to the usual reading.

Verfe the third. Till by her wit.] Some Manuscripts have it his wit, others your, others their wit. But as I find Corinna to be the name of a woman in other Authors, I cannot doubt but it should be her.

Stanza the third, Verfe the frift. A long and lasting anguish.] The German Manuscript reads a lasting passion, but the rhyme will not admit it.

Verfe the second. For Belvidera I endure.] Did not all the Manuscripts reclaim, I should change Belvidera into Pelvidera; Pelvis being used by several of the ancient Comic writers for a Looking-glafs, by which means the etymology of the word is very visible, and Pelvidera will signify a Lady who often looks in her glafs, as indeed she had very good reason, if she had all those beauties which our Poet here ascribes to her.

Verfe the third. Hourly I sigh and hourly languish.] Some for the word hourly read daily, and others nightly; the laft has great authorities of its side.

Stanza the fourth, Verfe the second. After a thousand beauties.] In several copies we meet with a hundred beauties, by the usual error of the transcribers, who probably omitted a cypher, and had not taste enough to know, that the word thousand was ten times a greater compliment to the Poet's Miftries than an hundred.

Verfe the fourth. And finds variety in one.] Most of the ancient Manuscripts have it in two. Indeed so many of them concur in this last reading, that I am very much in doubt whether it ought not to take place. There are but two reasons which incline me to the reading, as I have published it; first, because the rhime, and, secondly, because the sense is preferred by it. It might likewise proceed from the omission of the transcribers, who, to dispatch their work the sooner, used to write all numbers in cypher, and seeing the figure 1 followed by a little dash of the pen, pen, as is customary in old Manuscripts, they perhaps mistook the dash for a second figure, and by setting up both together composed out of them the figure 2. But this I shall leave to the learned, without determining any thing in a matter of so great uncertainty.

N° 471. Saturday, August 30.

Euripid.

The Time present seldom affords sufficient employment to the mind of man. Objects of pain or pleasure, love or admiration, do not lie thick enough together in life to keep the soul in constant action, and supply an immediate exercise to its faculties. In order, therefore, to remedy this defect, that the mind may not want business, but always have materials for thinking, she is endowed with certain powers, that can recall what is past, and anticipate what is to come.

That wonderful faculty, which we call the Memory, is perpetually looking back, when we have nothing present to entertain us. It is like those repositories in several animals, that are filled with stores of their former food, on which they may ruminate when their present pasture fails.

As the memory relieves the mind in her vacant moments, and prevents any chains of thought by ideas of what is past, we have other faculties that agitate and employ her upon what is to come. These are the passions of Hope and Fear.

By these two passions we reach forward into futurity, and bring up to our present thoughts objects that lie hid in the remotest depths of time. We suffer misery, and enjoy happiness, before they are in Being; we can set the Sun and Stars forward, or lose sight of them by wandering into those retired parts of eternity, when the heavens and earth shall be no more.

By the way, who can imagine that the existence of a creature is to be circumscribed by Time, whose thoughts are not? But I shall, in this paper, confine my self to that particular passion which goes by the name of Hope.

Our
Our actual enjoyments are so few and transient, that man would be a very miserable being, were he not endowed with this passion, which gives him a taste of those good things that may possibly come into his possession. We should hope for every thing that is good, says the old Poet Linus, because there is nothing which may not be hoped for, and nothing but what the gods are able to give us. Hope quickens all the still parts of life, and keeps the mind awake in her most remiss and indolent hours. It gives habitual serenity and good humour. It is a kind of vital heat in the Soul, that cheers and gladdens her, when she does not attend to it. It makes pain easie, and labour pleasant.

Besides these several advantages which rise from Hope, there is another which is none of the least, and that is, its great efficacy in preserving us from setting too high a value on present enjoyments. The saying of Cæsar is very well known. When he had given away all his estate in gratuities among his friends, one of them asked what he had left for himself; to which that great man replied, Hope. His natural magnanimity hindered him from pricing what he was certainly poiseffed of, and turned all his thoughts upon something more valuable that he had in view. I question not but every reader will draw a moral from this story, and apply it to himself without my direction.

The old story of Pandora's box (which many of the learned believe was formed among the heathens upon the tradition of the fall of man), shews us how deplorable a state they thought the present life without Hope. To set forth the utmost condition of misery they tell us, that our forefather, according to the Pagan Theology, had a great veil presented him by Pandora: upon his lifting up the lid of it, says the fable, there flew out all the calamities and discomforts incident to men, from which, till that time, they had been altogether exempt. Hope, who had been enclosed in the cup with so much bad company, instead of flying off with the rest, stuck so close to the lid of it, that it was shut down upon her.

I shall make but two reflections upon what I have hitherto said. First, that no kind of life is so happy as that which is full of Hope, especially when the Hope is well grounded, and when the object of it is of an exalted kind, and in its nature proper to make the person happy who enjoys it. This proposition must be very evident to those who consider how few are the present enjoyments of the most happy man, and how insufficient to give him an entire satisfaction and acquiescence in them.
My next observation is this, that a religious life is that which most abounds in a well-grounded Hope, and such an one as is fixed on objects that are capable of making us entirely happy. This Hope in a religious man, is much more pure and certain than the hope of any temporal blessing, as it is strengthened not only by reason, but by faith. It has at the same time its eye perpetually fixed on that state, which implies in the very notion of it the most full and most compleat happiness.

I have before shown how the influence of Hope in general sweetens life, and makes our present condition supportable, if not pleasing; but a religious Hope has still greater advantages. It does not only bear up the mind under her sufferings, but makes her rejoice in them, as they may be the instruments of procuring her the great and ultimate end of all her hope.

Religious Hope has likewise this advantage above any other kind of Hope, that it is able to revive the dying man, and to fill his mind not only with secret comfort and refreshment, but sometimes with rapture and transport. He triumphs in his agonies, whilst the Soul springs forward with delight to the great object which she has always had in view, and leaves the body with an expectation of being re-united to her in a glorious and joyful Resurrection.

I shall conclude this Essay with those emphatical expressions of a lively Hope, which the Psalmist made use of in the midst of those dangers and adversities which surrounded him; for the following passage had its precent and personal, as well as its future and prophetick sense. I have set the Lord always before me: because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved. Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth: my flesh also shall rest in hope. For thou wilt not leave my Soul in Hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine holy one to see corruption. Thou wilt shew me the path of life: in thy presence is fulness of joy, and at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore.
IT is an old observation, which has been made of politicians who would rather ingratiate themselves with their Sovereign, than promote his real service, that they accommodate their counsels to his inclinations, and advise him to such actions only as his heart is naturally set upon.

The Privy-counsellor of one in love must observe the same conduct, unless he would forfeit the friendship of the person who desires his advice. I have known several odd cases of this nature. Hipparchus was going to marry a common woman, but being resolved to do nothing without the advice of his friend Philander, he consulted him upon the occasion. Philander told him his mind freely, and represented his mistress to him in such strong colours, that the next morning he received a challenge for his pains, and before twelve a clock was run through the body by the man who had asked his advice. Celia was more prudent on the like occasion; she desired Leonilla to give her opinion freely upon a young fellow who made his addresses to her. Leonilla, to oblige her, told her with great frankness, that she looked upon him as one of the most worthless—Celia, foreseeing what a character she was to expect, begged her not to go on, for that she had been privately married to him above a fortnight. The truth of it is, a woman seldom asks advice before she has bought her wedding-cloaths. When she has made her own choice, for form's sake she sends a Conge d'être to her friends.

If we look into the secret springs and motives that set people at work on these occasions, and put them upon asking advice, which they never intend to take; I look upon it to be none of the least, that they are incapable of keeping a secret which is so very pleasing to them. A girl longs to tell her confidant, that she hopes to be married in a little time, and, in order to talk of the pretty fellow that dwells so much in her thoughts, asks her very gravely, what she would advise her to in a case of so much difficulty.
difficulty. Why else should Melissa, who had not a thousand pounds in the world, go into every quarter of the town to ask her acquaintance whether they would advise her to take Tom Townly, that made his address to her with an estate of five thousand a year? 'Tis very pleasant, on this occasion, to hear the Lady propose her doubts, and to see the pains she is at to get over them.

I must not here omit a practice that is in use among the vainest part of our own sex, who will often ask a friend's advice, in relation to a fortune whom they are never likely to come at. Will Honeycomb, who is now on the verge of three score, took me aside not long since, and asked me in his most serious look, whether I would advise him to marry my Lady Betty Single, who, by the way, is one of the greatest fortunes about town. I stared him full in the face upon so strange a question; up which he immediately gave me an inventory of her jewels and estate, adding, that he was resolved to do nothing in a matter of such confequence without my approbation. Finding he would have an answer, I told him, if he could get the Lady's consent, he had mine. This is about the tenth match which, to my knowledge, Will has consulted his friends upon, without ever opening his mind to the party herself.

I have been engaged in this subject by the following letter, which comes to me from some notable young female scribe, who, by the contents of it, seems to have carried matters so far, that she is ripe for asking advice;
but as I would not lose her good-will, nor forfeit the reputation which I have with her for wisdom, I shall only communicate the letter, to the publick, without returning any answer to it.

Mr. Spectator,

"NOW, Sir, the thing is this: Mr. Shapely is the prettiest Gentle-m' a man in town. He is very tall, but not too tall neither. He dances like an Angel. His mouth is made I do not know how, but it is the prettiest that I ever saw in my life. He is always laughing, for he has an infinite deal of wit. If you did but see how he rolls his stockings! He has a thousand pretty fancies, and I am sure, if you saw him, you would like him. He is a very good scholar, and can talk Latin as tall as English. I wish you could but see him dance. Now you must understand poor Mr. Shapely has no estate; but how can he help that, you know? And yet my friends are so unreasonable as to be always teasing me about him, because he has no estate: but I am sure he has that that is better than an estate; for he is a good-natured, ingenious, among my daily papers which I bestow on the publick, there are some which are written with regularity and method, and others that run out into the wildnes of those compositions which go by the name of Essays. As for the first, I have the whole scheme of the discourse in my mind before I set pen to paper. In the other kind of writing, it is sufficient that I have several thoughts on a subject, with out troubling my self to range them in such order, that they may seem to grow out of one another, and be disposed under the proper heads. Seneca and Montaigne are patterns for writing in this last kind, as Tully and Aristophanes excel in the other. When I read an Author of Genius who writes without method, I fancy myself in a wood that abounds with a great many noble objects, rising among one another in the greatest confusion and disorder. When I read a methodical discourse, I am in a regular plantation, and can place myself in its several centers, so as to take a view of all the lines and walks that are struck from them. You may ramble
ramble in the one a whole day together, and every moment discover something or other that is new to you; but when you have done, you will find but a confused imperfect notion of the place: in the other, your eye commands the whole prospect, and gives you such an idea of it, as is not easily worn out of the memory.

Irregularity and want of method are only supportable in men of great learning or genius, who are often too full to be exact, and therefore chiefly to throw down their pearls in heaps before the Reader, rather than be at the pains of stringing them.

Method is of advantage to a work, both in respect to the writer and the reader. In regard to the first, it is a great help to his invention. When a man has planned his discourse, he finds a great many thoughts rising out of every head, that do not offer themselves upon the general survey of a subject. His thoughts are at the same time more intelligible, and better discover their drift and meaning, when they are placed in their proper lights, and follow one another in a regular series, than when they are thrown together without order and connexion. There is always an obscurity in confusion, and the same sentence that would have enlightened the Reader in one part of a discourse, perplexes him in another. For the same reason likewise every thought in a methodical discourse shews itself in its greatest beauty, as the several figures in a piece of painting receive new grace from their disposition in the picture. The advantages of a Reader from a methodical discourse, are correspondent with those of the writer. He comprehends every thing easily, takes it in with pleasure, and retains it long.

Method is not less requisite in ordinary conversation than in writing, provided a man would talk to make himself understood. I, who hear a thousand Coffee-house debates every day, am very sensible of this want of method in the thoughts of my honest countrymen. There is not one dispute in ten which is managed in those schools of politics, where, after the three first sentences, the question is not entirely lost. Our disputants put me in mind of the skuttle-fish, that when he is unable to extricate himself, blackens all the water about him till he becomes invisible. The man who does not know how to methodize his thoughts, has always, to borrow a phrase from the Difpenary, a barren superficiality of words: the fruit is lost amidst the exuberance of leaves.

Tom Puzzled is one of the most eminent immethodical disputants of any that has fallen under my observation. Tom has read enough to make him very impertinent; his knowledge is sufficient to raise doubts, but he does not.
not to clear them. It is pity that he has so much learning, or that he has not a great deal more. With these qualifications Tom sets up for a Free-thinker, finds a great many things to blame in the constitution of his country, and gives threwd intimations that he does not believe another world. In short, Puzzle is an atheist as much as his parts will give him leave. He has got about half a dozen common-place topics, into which he never fails to turn the conversation, whatever was the occasion of it; though the matter in debate be about Downey or Denain, it is ten to one but half his discourse runs upon the unreasonableness of bigotry and priest-craft. This makes Mr. Puzzle the admiration of all those who have less sense than himself, and the contempt of all those who have more. There is none in town whom Tom dreads so much as my friend Will Dry. Will, who is acquainted with Tom's Logic, when he finds him running off the question, cuts him short with a What then? see allow all this to be true, but what is it to our present purpose? I have known Tom eloquent half an hour together, and triumphing, as he thought, in the superiority of argument, when he has been non-plussed on a sudden by Mr. Dry's desiring him to tell the company what it was that he endeavoured to prove. In short, Dry is a man of a clear methodical head, but few words, and gains the same advantages over Puzzle, that a small body of regular troops would gain over a numberless undisciplined Militia.

SIR,

HAVING lately read your Essay on the pleasures of the imagination, I was so taken with your thoughts upon some of our English gardens, that I cannot forbear troubling you with a Letter upon that that subject. I am one; you must know, who am looked upon as a humourist in gardening. I have several acres about my house, which I call my Garden; and which a skilful gardener would not know what to call.
It is a confusión of kitchen and parterre, orchard and flower-garden, which lie so mixt and interwoven with one another, that if a foreigner who had seen nothing of our country should be conveyed into my garden at his first landing, he would look upon it as a natural wilderness, and one of the uncultivated parts of our country. My flowers grow up in several parts of the garden in the greatest luxuriancy and profusion. I am so far from being fond of any particular one, by reason of its rarity, that if I meet with any one in a field which pleases me, I give it a place in my garden. By this means, when a stranger walks with me, he is surprized to see several large spots of ground covered with ten thousand different colours, and has often fangled out flowers that he might have met with under a common hedge, in a field, or in a meadow, as some of the greatest beauties of the place. The only method I observe in this particular, is to range in the same quarter the produce of the same season, that they may make their appearance together, and compose a picture of the greatest variety. There is the same irregularity in my planttations, which run into as great a wilderness as their natures will permit.
I take in none that do not naturally rejoice in the soil, and am pleased when I am walking in a labyrinth of my own raising, not to know whether the next tree I shall meet with is an apple or an oak, an elm or a pear-tree. My kitchen has likewise its particular quarters assigned it; for besides the wholesome luxury which that place abounds with, I have always thought a kitchen-garden a more plentient sight than the finest orangery, or artificial green-house. I love to see every thing in its perfec tion, and am more pleased to survey my rows of coleworts and cabbages, with a thousand nameless pot-herbs, springing up in their full fra-grancy and verdure, than to see the tender plants of foreign countries kept alive by artificial heats, or withering in an air or foil that are not adapted to them. I must not omit, that there is a fountain rising in the upper part of my garden, which forms a little wandering rill, and administers to the pleasure as well as the plenty of the place. I have so conducted it, that it visits most of my plantations; and have taken particular care to let it run in the same manner as it would do in an open field, so that it generally passes through banks of violets and primroses, places of willows; or other plants, that seem to be of its own producing. There is another circumstance, in which I am very particular, or, as my neighbours
bours call me, very whimsical: as my garden invites it all the birds of the country, by offering them the convenience of springs and shades, solitude and shelter, I do not suffer any one to destroy their nests in the spring, or drive them from their usual haunts in fruit-time. I value my garden more for being full of blackbirds than cherries, and very frankly give them fruit for their songs. By this means I have always the music of the season in its perfection, and am highly delighted to see the Jay of the Thrush hopping about my walks, and shooting before my eye across the several little glades and alleys that I pass through. I think there are as many kinds of gardening as of poetry: your makers of parterres and flower-gardens, are Epigrammatists and Sonneteers in this art; contrivers of bowers and grotto's, trellises and cascades, are Romancers: writers. Wise and London are our heroic Poets; and if, as a Critic, I may single out any passage of their works to commend, I shall take notice of that part in the upper garden at Kensington, which was at first nothing but a gravel-pit. It must have been a fine genius for gardening, that could have thought of forming such an unsightly hollow into so beautiful an area, and to have hit the eye with so uncommon and agreeable a scene as that which it is now wrought into. To give this particular spot of ground the greater effect, they have made a very pleasing contralt: for as on one side of the walk you see this hollow basin, with its several little plantations lying so conveniently under the eye of the beholder; on the other side of it there appears a seeming mount, made up of trees rising one higher than another in proportion as they approach the center. A spectator, who has not heard this account of it, would think this circular mount was not only a real one, but that it had been actually scooped out of that hollow space which I have before mentioned. I never yet met with any one who had walked in this garden, who was not struck with that part of it which I have here mentioned. As for myself, you will find, by the account which I have already given you, that my compositions in gardening are altogether after the Pindaric manner, and run into the beautiful wildness of nature, without affecting the nicer elegancies of art. What I am now going to mention, will perhaps deserve your attention more than any thing I have yet said. I find, that in the discourse which I spoke of at the beginning of my Letter, you are against filling an English garden with ever-greens; and indeed I am so far of your opinion, that I can by no means think the verdure of an ever-green comparable to that which shoots out naturally, and clothes our trees in the summer-season. But I have often wondered that those who are like my self, self, and love to live in gardens, have never thought of contriving a Winter-garden, which would consist of such trees only, as never cast the leaves. We have very often little patches of sunshine and fair weather in the most uncomfortable parts of the year, and have frequently several days in November and January that are as agreeable as any in the finest months. At such times, therefore, I think there could not be a greater pleasure, than to walk in such a Winter-garden as I have proposed In the summer-seaon the whole country blooms, and is a kind of garden, for which reason we are not so sensible of those beauties that at this time may be every where met with; but when nature is in her desolation, and presents us with nothing but bleak and barren prospect, there is something unspeakably cheerful in a spot of ground which is covered with trees that smile amidst all the rigours of winter, and give us a view of the most gay scene in the midst of that which is the most dead and melancholy.

I have so far indulged my self in this thought, that I have fard apart a whole acre of ground for the executing of it. The walls are covered with Ivy instead of Vines. The laurel, the hornbeam, and the holly, with many other trees and plants of the same nature, grow so thick in it, that you cannot imagine a more lively scene. The glowing redness of the berries, with which they are hung at this time, vies with the verdure of their leaves, and are apt to inspire the heart of the beholder with that vernal delight which you have somewhere taken notice of in your former papers. It is very pleasant, at the same time, to see the several kinds of birds retiring into this little green spot, and enjoying themselves among the branches and foliage, when my great garden, which I have before mentioned to you, does not afford a single leaf for their shelter.

You must know, Sir, that I look upon the pleasure which we take in a garden, as one of the most innocent delights in human life. A garden was the habitation of our first Parents before the Fall. It is naturally apt to fill the mind with calmness and tranquillity, and to lay all its turbulent passions at rest. It gives us a great insight into the contrivance and wisdom of Providence, and suggests innumerable subjects for meditation.
I cannot, but think the very complacency and satisfaction which a man takes in these works of nature, to be a laudable, if not a virtuous habit of mind. For all which reasons I hope you will pardon the length of my present Letter.

Yours, SIR, &c.

Compositus melius cum Bitbo Bacchius, in jus

---

Hor.

It is sometimes pleasant enough to consider the different notions, which different persons have of the same thing. If men of low condition very often set a value on things, which are not prized by those who are in a higher station of life, there are many things thefe esteem which are in no value among persons of an inferior rank. Common people are, in particular, very much astonished, when they hear of those solemn contests and debates, which are made among the Great upon the punctilio's of a public ceremony; and wonder to hear that any business of consequence should be retarded by those little circumstances, which they reprefent to themselves as trifling and insignificant. I am mighty pleased with a porter's decision in one of Mr. Southern's Plays, which is founded upon that fine delineation of a virtuous woman's marrying a second husband, while her first was yet living. The first husband, who was supposed to have been dead, returning to his house after a long absence, raises a noble perplexity for the tragic part of the play. In the mean while, the nurse and the porter conferring upon the difficulties that would ensue in such a case, honest Sampfon thinks the matter may be easily decided, and solves it very judiciously, by the old proverb, that if his first mate be still living, The man must have his mare again. There is nothing in my time which has so much surprized and confounded the greatest part of my honest countrymen, as the present controversy between Count Rechteren and Monfreur Meftager, which employs the wife heads of so many nations, and holds all the affairs of Europe in suspense.

Upon my going into a Coffee-house yesterday, and landing an ear to the next table, which was encompassed with a circle of inferior politicians, one of them, after having read over the news very attentively, broke broke out into the following remarks. I am afraid, says he, this unhappy rupture between the Footmen at Drreche will retard the peace of Christendom. I wish the Pope may not be at the bottom of it. His Holiness has a very good hand at fomenting a division, as the poor Swiss Cantons have lately experienced to their cost. If Monsieur What-d'ye-call-him's domesticks will not come to an accommodation, I do not know how the quarrel can be ended, but by a religious war.

Why truly, says a Witsacre that sat by him, were I as the King of France, I would scorn to take part with the footmen of either side; here's all the business of Europe stands still, because Monsieur Mensanger's man has had his head broke. If Count Reytrum had given them a pot of ale after it, all would have been well, without any of this bustle; but they say he is a warm man, and does not care to be made mouths at.

Upon this, one, that had held his tongue hitherto, began to exert himself; declaring, that he was very well pleased the plenipotentiaries of our Christian Princes took this matter into their serious consideration; for that Lacqueys were never so saucy and pragmatical, as they are now-a-days, and that he should be glad to see them taken down in the treaty of peace, if it might be done without prejudice to the publick affairs.

One, who sat at the other end of the table, and seemed to be in the interests of the French King, told them, that they did not take the matter right, for that his most Christian Majesty did not refer this matter because it was an injury done to Monsieur Mensanger's footmen; for, says he, are Monsieur Mensanger's footmen to him? but because it was done to his subjects. Now, says he, let me tell you, it would look very odd for a subject of France to have a bloody nose, and his Sovereign not to take notice of it. He is obliged in honour to defend his people against hostilities; and if the Dutch will be so inofficious to a crowned Head, as, in any wife, to cuff or kick those who are under his protection, I think he is in the right to call them to an account for it.

This distinction set the controversy upon a new foot, and seemed to be very well approved by most that heard it, till a little warm fellow, who declared himself a friend to the house of Austria, fell most unmercifully upon his Gallick Majesty, as encouraging his subjects to make mouths at their betters, and afterwards skreening them from the punishment that was due to their insolence. To which he added, that the French nation was so addicted to grimace, that if there was not a flop put to it at the general Congress, there would be no walking the streets for them in a time of peace, especially if they continued matters of the West-Indies.
The little man proceeded with a great deal of warmth, declaring, that if the Allies were of his mind, he would oblige the French King to burn his galleys, and tolerate the Protestant religion in his dominions, before he would shear his sword. He concluded with calling Monseigneur Mesnager an insignificant prig.

The dispute was now growing very warm, and one does not know where it would have ended, had not a young man of about one and twenty, who seems to have been brought up with an eye to the law, taken the debate into his hand, and given it as his opinion, that neither Count Rechberen nor Monseigneur Mesnager had behaved themselves right in this affair. Count Rechberen, says he, should have made affidavit that his servants had been affronted, and then Monseigneur Mesnager would have done him justice, by taking away their livery from them, or some other way that he might have thought the most proper; for let me tell you, if a man makes a mouth at me, I am not to knock the teeth out of it for his pains. Then again, as for Monseigneur Mesnager, upon his servant's being beaten, why, he might have had his action of assault and battery. But as the case now stands, if you will have my opinion, I think they ought to bring it to Reference.

I heard a great deal more of this controversy, but I must confess, with little edification; for all I could learn at last from these honest Gentlemen, was, that the matter in debate was of too high a nature for such heads as theirs, or mine, to comprehend.

Floriferis aut agros in salibus omnia habunt. Lucr.

When I have published any single paper that falls in with the popular taste, and pleases more than ordinary, it always brings me in a great return of letters. My Tuesday’s discourse, wherein I gave several admonitions to the fraternity of the Henpeck’d, has already produced me very many correspondents; the reason I cannot guess at, unless it be that such a discourse is of general use, and every married man’s money.
money. An honest tradesman, who dights his letter from Cheapside, sends me thanks in the name of a club, who, he tells me, meet as often as their wives will give them leave, and stay together till they are sent for home. He informs me, that my paper has administrated great consolation to their whole Club, and desires me to give some further account of Socrates, and to acquaint them in whose reign he lived, whether he was a citizen or courtier, whether he buried Xantippe, with many other particulars: for that by his sayings he appears to have been a very wise man, and a good Christian. Another, who writes himself Benjamin Bamboo, tells me, that being coupled with a shrew, he had endeavoured to tame her by such lawful means as those which I mentioned in my last Tuesday's paper, and that in his wrath he had often gone further than Bracton allows in those cases; but that for the future he was resolved to bear it like a man of temper and learning, and consider her only as one who lives in his house to teach him Philosophy. Tom Dapperwit says, that he agrees with me in that whole discourse, excepting only the last sentence, where I affirm the married state to be either a Heaven or a Hell. Tom has been at the charge of a penny upon this occasion, to tell me, that by his experience it is neither one nor the other, but rather that middle kind of state commonly known by the name of Purgatory.

The fair sex have likewise obliged me with their reflections upon the same discourse. A Lady, who calls her self Euterpe, and seems a woman of letters, asks me whether I am for establishing the Salick law in every family, and why it is not fit that a woman who has discretion and learning should sit at the helm, when the husband is weak and illiterate? Another, of a quite contrary character, subscribes her self Xantippe, and tells me, that she follows the example of her name-sake; for being married to a bookish man, who has no knowledge of the world, she is forced to take their affairs into her own hands, and to train him up now and then, that he may not grow mutty, and unfit for conversation.

After this abridgment of some letters which are come to my hands upon this occasion, I shall publish one of them at large.

Mr. Spectator,

"You have given us a lively picture of that kind of husband who "comes under the denomination of the Henpeck’d; but I do not "remember that you have ever touched upon one that is of the quite dif "ferent character, and who, in several places of England, goes by the "name of a Go’-quean. I have the misfortune to be joined for life with F f f f 2 "one one of this character, who in reality is more a woman than I am. He was bred up under the tuition of a tender mother, till she had made him as good an housewife as her self. He could preserve apricocks, and make jellies, before he had been two years out of the nursery.
He was never suffered to go abroad, for fear of catching cold when he should have been hunting down a buck, he was by his mother's side, learning how to seafon it, or put it in crust; and was making paperboats with his sisters, at an age when other young Gentlemen are crossing the seas, or travelling into foreign countries. He has the whitest hand that you ever saw in your life, and raises paste better than any woman in England. These qualifications make him a sad husband: he is perpetually in the kitchen, and has a thousand squabbles with the cook-maid. He is better acquainted with the milk-fcore, than his steward's accounts. I fret to death when I hear him find fault with a dish that is not dressed to his liking, and insinuating his friends that dine with him in the belt pickle for a walnut, or sauce for an haunch of venison.
With all this, he is a very good-natured husband, and never fell out with me in his life but once, upon the over-roasting of a dish of wild-fowl: at the same time I must own I would rather he was a man of a rough temper, that would treat me hardly sometimes, than of such an effeminate bafy nature in a province that does not belong to him Since you have given us the character of a wife who wears the breeches, pray say something of a husband that wears the petticoat. Why should not a female character be as ridiculous in a man, as a male character in one of our sex?

I am, &c.

Nec Deus interst, nisi dignus vindice nodus Inciderit------

Hor.

We cannot be guilty of a greater act of uncharitableness, than to interpret the afflictions which befall our neighbours, as Punishments and Judgments. It aggravates the evil to him who suffers, when he looks upon himself as the mark of divine vengeance, and abates the compassion of those towards him, who regard him in so dreadful a light. This humour of turning every misfortune into a judgment, proceeds from wrong notions of religion, which, in its own nature, produces good-will towards men, and puts the mildest constriction upon every accident that befalls them. In this case, therefore, it is not religion that furs a man's temper, but it is his temper that furs his religion; people of gloomy unheasal imaginations, or of envious malignant tempers, whatever kind of life they are engaged in, will discover their natural tincture of mind in all their thoughts, words, and actions. As the finest wines have often the taste of the soil, so even the most religious thoughts often draw something that is particular from the constitution of the mind, in which they arise. When folly or superstition strike in with this natural depravity of temper, it is not in the power, even of religion itself, to preserve the character of the person who is possessed with it, from appearing highly absurd and ridiculous.

An old maiden Gentlewoman, whom I shall conceal under the name of Nemesis, is the greatest discoverer of judgments that I have met with. She can tell you what sin it was that set such a man's house on fire, or blew down his barns. Talk to her of an unfortunate young Lady that lost her beauty by the small-pox, she fetches a deep sigh, and tells you, that when she had a fine face she was always looking on it in her glass. Tell her of a piece of good fortune that has befell one of her acquaintance; and she wishes it may prosper with her, but her mother used one of her nieces very barbarously. Her usual remarks turn upon people who had great estates, but never enjoyed them, by reason of some flaw in their own, or their father's behaviour. She can give you the reason why such an one died childless: why such an one was cut off in the flower of his youth: why such an one was unhappy in her marriage: why one broke his leg on such a particular spot of ground; and why another was killed with a back-sword, rather than with any other kind of weapon. She has a crime for every misfortune that can befall any of her acquaintance; and when she hears of a robbery that has been made, or a murder that has been committed, enlarges more on the guilt of the suffering person, than on that of the thief or the assassin. In short, she is so good a churlish, that whatever happens to her self is a trial, and whatever happens to her neighbours is a judgment.

The very description of this folly, in ordinary life, is sufficient to expel it; but when it appears in a pomp and dignity of style, it is very apt to to amuse and terrify the mind of the Reader. Herodotus and Plutarch very often apply their judgments as impertinently as the old woman I have before mentioned, though their manner of relating them makes the folly it self appear venerable. Indeed, most historians, as well Christian as pagan, have fallen into this idle superstition, and spoken of ill success, unforeseen disasters, and terrible events, as if they had been let into the secrets of providence, and made acquainted with that private conduct by which the world is governed. One would think several of our own historians in particular had many revelations of this kind made to them.

Our old English Monks seldom let any of their Kings depart in peace, who had endeavoured to diminish the power or wealth of which the ecclesiastics were in those times possessed. William the Conqueror’s race generally found their judgments in the New Forest, where their father had pulled down churches and monasteries. In short, read one of the chronicles written by an author of this frame of mind, and you would think you were reading a history of the Kings of Israel or Judah, where the historians were actually inspired, and where, by a particular scheme of providence, the Kings were distinguished by judgments or blessings, according as they promoted idolatry or the worship of the true God.

I cannot but look upon this manner of judging upon misfortunes, not only to be very uncharitable in regard to the person on whom they fall, but very presumptuous in regard to him who is supposed to inflict them. It is a strong argument for a state of retribution hereafter, that in this world virtuous persons are very often unfortunate, and vicious persons prosperous; which is wholly repugnant to the nature of a Being who appears infinitely wise and good in all his works; unless we may suppose that such a promiscuous and undistinguishing distribution of good and evil, which was necessary for carrying on the designs of providence in this life, will be rectified and made amends for in another. We are not therefore to expect that fire should fall from Heaven in the ordinary course of providences; nor when we see triumphant guilt or depressed virtue in particular persons, that omnipotence will make bare his holy arm in the defence of the one, or punishment of the other. It is sufficient that there is a day set apart for the hearing and requiting of both according to their respective merits.

The folly of ascribing temporal judgments to any particular crimes may appear from several considerations. I shall only mention two: first, that generally speaking, there is no calamity or affliction, which is supposed to have happened as a judgment to a vicious man, which does not sometimes times happen to men of approved religion and virtue. When Diagoras the atheist was on board one of the Athenian Ships, there arose a very violent tempest; upon which the mariners told him, that it was a just judgment upon them for having taken so impious a man on board. Diagoras begged them to look upon the rest of the ships that were in the same distress, and asked them whether or no Diagoras was on board every vessel in the fleet. We are all involved in the same calamities, and subject to the same accidents; and when we see any one of the species under any particular oppression, we should look upon it as arising from the common lot of human nature, rather than from the guilt of the person who suffers.

Another consideration, that may check our presumption in putting such a construction upon a misfortune, is this, that it is impossible for us to know what are calamities and what are blessings. How many accidents have passed for misfortunes, which have turned to the welfare and prosperity of the persons in whose lot they have fallen? How many disappointments have, in their consequences, saved a man from ruin? If we could look into the effects of every thing, we might be allowed to pronounce boldly upon blessings and judgments; but for a man to give his opinion of what he sees but in part, and in its beginnings, is an unjustifiable piece of rashness and folly. The story of Biron and Clitobrus, which was in great reputation among the heathens, for we see it quoted by all the ancient Authors, both Greek and Latin, who have written upon the immortality of the soul, may teach us a caution in this matter. These two brothers, being the sons of a Lady who was Priestess of Juno, drew their mother's chariot to the temple at the time of a great solemnity, the persons being absent, who by their office were to have drawn her chariot on that occasion. The mother was so transported with this instance of filial duty, that she petitioned her Goddess to bestow upon them the greatest gift that could be given to men; upon which they were both cast into a deep sleep, and the next morning found dead in the temple. This was such an event, as would have been construed into a judgment, had it happened to the two brothers after an act of disobedience, and would doubtless have been represented as such by any ancient historian who had given us an account of it.

Thursday,
THOUGH there are many Authors, who have written on dreams, they have generally considered them only as revelations of what has already happened in distant parts of the world, or as preludes of what is to happen in future periods of time.

I shall consider this subject in another light, as dreams may give us some idea of the great excellency of a human soul, and some intimations of its independency on matter.

In the first place, our dreams are great instances of that activity which is natural to the human soul, and which it is not in the power of sleep to deaden or abate. When the man appears tired and worn out with the labours of the day, this active part in his composition is still busied and unwearied. When the organs of sense want their due repose and necessary reparations, and the body is no longer able to keep pace with that spiritual substance to which it is united, the soul exerts her self in her several faculties, and continues in the action till her partner is again qualified to bear her company. In this case dreams look like the relaxations and amusements of the soul, when she is disembarrassed of her machine, her sports and recreations, when she has laid her charge asleep.

In the second place, dreams are an instance of that agility and perfection which is natural to the faculties of the mind, when they are disengaged from the body. The soul is clogged and retarded in her operations, when she acts in conjunction with a companion that is so heavy and unwieldy in its motions. But in dreams it is wonderful to observe with what a sprightliness and alacrity she exerts her self. The flow of speech make unpremeditated harangues, or converse readily in languages that they are but little acquainted with. The grave abound in pleasantries, the dull in repartees and points of wit. There is not a more painful action of the mind, than invention; yet in dreams it works with that safe and activity, that we are not sensible when the faculty is employed.
For instance, I believe every one, sometime or other, dreams that he is reading papers, books, or letters; in which case the invention prompts so readily, that the mind is imposed upon, and mistakes its own suggestions for the compositions of another.
I shall, under this head, quote a palliation out of the Religio Medici, in which the ingenious Author gives an account of himself in his dreaming and his waking thoughts. We are somewhat more than our senses in our sleeps, and the number of the body seems to be but the waking of the soul.
It is the libation of sense, but the liberty of reason; and our waking conceptions do not match the fancies of our sleeps. At my nativity my ascendant was the watery sign of Scorpio: I was born in the planetary hour of Saturn, and I think, I have a piece of that leaden planet in me. I am no way facetious, nor disposed for the mirth and galliardize of company; yet in one dream I can compose a whole Comedy, behold the action, comprehend the jets, and laugh myself awake at the conceits thereof.
Wert my memory as faithful as my reason is then fruitful, I would never study but in my dreams; and this time also would I choose for my devotions: but our grosser memories have then so little hold of our abstracted understandings, that they forget the story, and can only relate to our awaked souls a confused and broken tale of that that has passed—Thus it is observed that men sometimes, upon the hour of their departure, do speak and reason above themselves; for then the soul beginning to be freed from the ligaments of the body, begins to reason like her self, and to disjuge in a strain above mortality.
We may likewise observe, in the third place, that the passions affect the mind with greater strength when we are asleep, than when we are awake. Joy and sorrow give us more vigorous sensations of pain or pleasure at this time, than any other. Devotion likewise, as the excel-ent Author above-mentioned has hinted, is in a very particular manner heightened and inflamed, when it rises in the soul at a time that the body is thus laid at rest. Every man's experience will inform him in this matter, though it is very probable, that this may happen differently, in different constitutions. I shall conclude this head with the two following problems, which I shall leave to the solution of my Reader. Supposing a man always happy in his dreams, and miserable in his waking thoughts, and that his life was equally divided between them, whether would he be more happy or miserable? Were a man a King in his dreams, and a beggar awake, and dreamt as consequently, and in as continued unbroken
broken schemes as he thinks when awake, whether he would be in reality a King or a Beggar, or rather whether he would not be both?

There is another circumstance, which methinks gives us a very high idea of the nature of the soul, in regard to what passes in dreams. I mean that innumerable multitude and variety of ideas which then arise in her. Were that active and watchful Being only conscious of her own existence at such a time, what a painful solitude would her hours of sleep be? Were the soul sensible of her being alone in her sleeping moments, after the same manner that she is sensible of it while awake, the time would hang very heavy on her, as it often actually does when she dreams that she is in such a solitude;

--- Semperque relinqui
Sola si bi semper longam inominita videtur
Ire viam

--- Virg.

But this observation I only make by the way. What I would here remark, is that wonderful power in the soul, of producing her own company upon these occasions. She converses with innumerable Beings of her own creation, and is transported into ten thousand scenes of her own raising. She is her self the Theatre, the Actor, and the Beholder. This puts me in mind of a layin which I am infinitely pleased with, and which Plutarch ascribes to Heraclitus, That all men whilst they are awake are in one common world; but that each of them, when he is asleep, is in a world of his own. The waking man is conversant in the world of nature, when he sleeps he retires to a private world that is particular to himself. There seems something in this consideration that intimates to us a natural grandeur and perfection in the soul, which is rather to be admired than explained.

I must not omit that argument for the excellency of the soul, which I have been quoted out of Tertullian, namely, its power of divining in dreams. That several such divinations have been made, none can question, who believes the Holy writings, or who has but the least degree of a common historical faith; there being innumerable instances of this nature in several Authors, both ancient and modern, sacred and profane. Whether such dark preludes, such visions of the night proceed from any latent power in the soul, during this her state of abstraction, or from any communication with the Supreme Being, or from any operation of subordinate spiriits, has been a great dispute among the learned; the matter of fact is, I think, incontestable, and has been looked upon as such by the
the greatest writers, who have been never suspected either of superstition or enthusiasm.

I do not suppose, that the soul in these instants is entirely loose and unfettered from the body: it is sufficient, if she is not too far sunk, and immersed in matter, nor intangled and perplexed in her operations, with such motions of blood and spirits, as when she actuates the machine in its waking hours. The corporeal union is slackened enough to give the mind more play. The soul seems gathered within her self, and recovers that spring which is broke and weakned, when she operates more in concert with the body.

The Speculations I have here made, if they are not arguments, they are at least strong intimations, not only of the excellency of a human soul, but of its independance on the body; and if they do not prove, do at least confirm these two great points, which are established by many other reasons that are altogether unanswerable.

N° 488. Friday, September 19.

Quanti empte? parvi. Quanti ergo? octo assibus. Eheu! Hor.

I find, by several Letters which I receive daily, that many of my Readers would be better pleased to pay three half-pence for my paper, than two-pence. The ingenious T. W. tells me, that I have deprived him of the bulk part of his breakfast, for that, since the rise of my paper, he is forced every morning to drink his dish of Coffee by itself, without the addition of the Spectator, that used to be better than lace to it. Eugenius informs me very obligingly, that he never thought he should have disliked any passage in my paper, but that of late there have been two words in every one of them, which he could heartily with left out, viz. Price Two-pence. I have a Letter from a Soap-boiler, who condoles with me very affectionately, upon the necessity we both lie under of letting an higher price on our commodities, since the late Tax has been laid upon them, and defining me, when I write next on that subject, to speak a word or two upon the present duties on castile-soap. But there is none of these my correspondents, who writes with a greater turn of good sense and elegance of expression, than the generous Philomedes, who advices me to value every Spectator at six-pence, and promises that he himself will engage for above a hundred of his acquaintance, who shall take it in at that price.

Letters from the female world are likewise come to me, in great quantities, upon the same occasion; and as I naturally bear a great deference to this part of our species, I am very glad to find that those who approve my conduct in this particular, are much more numerous than those who condemn it. A large family of daughters have drawn me up a very handsome remonstrance, in which they set forth, that their father having refused to take in the Spectator, since the additional price was set upon it, they offered him unanimously to abate him the article of bread and butter in the Tea-table account, provided the Spectator might be served up to them every morning as usual. Upon this the old Gentleman, being pleased, it seems, with their desire of improving themselves, has granted them the continuance both of the Spectator and their bread and butter; having given particular orders, that the Tea-table shall be set forth every morning with its customary bill of fare, and without any manner of defalcation. I thought my self obliged to mention this particular, as it does honour to this worthy Gentleman; and if the young Lady Latitia, who lent me this account, will acquaint me with his name, I will insert it at length in one of my papers, if he desires it.

I should be very glad to find out any expedient that might alleviate the expence which this my paper brings to any of my Readers; and, in order to it, must propose two points to their consideration. First, that if they retrench any the smallest particular in their ordinary expence, it will easily make up the half-penny a day, which we have now under consideration. Let a Lady sacrifice but a single ribband to her morning studies, and it will be sufficient: Let a family burn but a candle a-night less than the usual number, and they may take in the Spectator without detriment to their private affairs.

In the next place, if my Readers will not go to the price of buying my papers by retail, let them have patience, and they may buy them in the lump, without the burden of a tax upon them. My Speculations, when they are sold single, like cherries upon the stick, are delights for the rich and wealthy; after some time they come to market in greater quantities, and are every ordinary man's money. The truth of it is, they have a certain flavour at their first appearance, from several accidental circum-

fliances of time, place and person, which they may lose if they are not taken early; but in this case every Reader is to consider, whether it is not better for him to be half a year behind-hand with the fashionable and polite part of the world, than to strain himself beyond his circumstances. My bookseller has now about ten thousand of the third and fourth Volumes, which he is ready to publish, having already disposed of as large an edition both of the first and second Volume. As he is a person whose head is very well turned to his business, he thinks they would be a very proper present to be made to persons at christenings, marriages, visiting-days, and the like joyful solemnities, as several other books are frequently given at funerals. He has printed them in such a little portable Volume, that many of them may be ranged together upon a single plate; and is of opinion, that a falter of Spectators would be as acceptable an entertainment to the Ladies, as a falter of sweetmeats.

I shall conclude this paper with an Epigram lately sent to the writer of the Spectator, after having returned my thanks to the ingenious Author of it.

SIR,

"Having heard the following Epigram very much commended, I wonder that it has not yet had a place in any of your papers; "I think the suffrage of our Poet-laureat should not be overlooked, which shows the opinion he entertains of your paper, whether the notion he proceeds upon be true or false. I make bold to convey it to you, not knowing if it has yet come to your hands.

On the Spectator, By Mr. TATE.

Aliusque et idem Naceris—Hor.

When first the Tatter to a mute was turn'd,
Great Britain for her Conser's silence mourn'd:
Robb'd of his prizest beams, she wept the night,
Till the Spectator rose, and blaz'd as bright.

So the first man the Sun's first setting view'd,
And sigh'd, till circling day his joys renew'd:
Tet doubtful how that second Sun to name,
Whether a bright successor, or the same.

So we: but now from this suspense are freed,
Since all agree, who both with judgment read,
'Tis the same Sun, and does himself succeed.

Saturday,
SIR,

UPON reading your Essay, concerning the pleasures of the imagination, I find among the three sources of those pleasures which you have discovered, that Greatness is one. This has suggested to me the reason why, of all objects that I have ever seen, there is none which affects my imagination so much as the sea or ocean. I cannot see the heaving of this prodigious bulk of waters, even in a calm, without a very pleasing astonishment; but when it is worked up in a tempest, so that the Horizon on every side is nothing but foaming billows and floating mountains, it is impossible to describe the agreeable horror that rises from such a prospect. A troubled ocean, to a man who fails upon it, is, I think, the biggest object that he can see in motion, and consequently gives his imagination one of the highest kinds of pleasure that can arise from greatness. I must confess, it is impossible for me to survey this world of fluid matter, without thinking on the hand that first poured it out, and made a proper channel for its reception. Such an object naturally raises in my thoughts the idea of an almighty Being, and convinces me of his existence as much as a metaphysical demonstration. The imagination prompts the understanding, and by the greatness of the sensible object, produces in it the idea of a Being who is neither circumscribed by time nor space.

As I have made several voyages upon the sea, I have often been tossed in storms, and on that occasion have frequently reflected on the descriptions of them in ancient Poets. I remember Longinus highly recommends one in Homer, because the Poet has not amused himself with little fancies upon the occasion, as Authors of an inferior genius, whom he mentions, had done, but because he has gathered together those circumstances which are the most apt to terrify the imagination, and which really happen in the raging of a tempest. It is for the same reason, that I prefer for the following description of a ship in a storm, which the Psalmist has made, before any other I have ever met with. They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters; these men see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep. For he commandeth and raiseth the stormy wind, which stirreth up the waters thereof. They mount up to Heaven, they go down again to the depths, their soul is melted because of trouble. They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and are at their wits' end. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he bringeth them out of their distresses. He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still. Then they are glad because they be quiet, so he bringeth them unto their desired haven.

By the way, how much more comfortable, as well as rational, is this system of the Psalmist, than the pagan scheme in Virgil, and other Poets, where one Deity is represented as raising a storm, and another as laying it? Were we only to consider the Sublime in this piece of poetry, what can be nobler than the idea it gives us of the supreme Being thus raising a tumult among the elements, and recovering them out of their confusion, thus troubling and calming nature?

Great Painters do not only give us Landskips of gardens, groves, and meadows, but very often employ their pencils upon sea-pieces: I could wish you would follow their example. If this small sketch may deliver a place among your works, I shall accompany it with a divine Ode, made by a Gentleman upon the conclusion of his travels.

I.

How are thy servants blest, O Lord!
How sure is their defence!
Eternal wisdom is their guide,
Their help Omnipotence.

II.

In foreign realms, and lands remote,
Supported by thy care,
Thro' burning climes I pass'd unburnt,
And breath'd in tainted air.

III.

Thy mercy sweetened ev'ry soil,
Made ev'ry region pleasant;
The hoary Alpine hills it warm'd,
And smooth'd the Tyrrenian seas.

IV. Think.
IV.
Think, O my Soul, devoutly think,
How with affrighted eyes
Thou saw'st the wide extended deep
In all its horrors rise!

V.
Confusion dwelt in ev'ry face,
And fear in ev'ry heart;
When waves on waves, and gulphs in gulphs,
O'ercame the pilot's art.

VI.
Yet then from all my griefs, O Lord,
Thy mercy set me free,
Whilst in the confidence of pray'r
My soul took hold on thee.

VII.
For tho' in dreadful whirls we hung
High on the broken wave,
I knew thou wert not slow to hear,
Nor impotent to save.

VIII.
The storm was laid, the winds retir'd,
Obedient to thy will;
The sea that roar'd at thy command,
At thy command was still.

IX.
In midst of dangers, fears and death,
Thy goodness I'll adore,
And praise thee for thy mercies past;
And humbly hope for more.

X.
My life, if thou preserv'st my life,
Thy sacrifice shall be;
And death, if death must be my doom,
Shall join my soul to thee.

Friday,
A bout an age ago it was the fashion in England, for every one that would be thought religious, to throw as much sanctity as possible into his face, and in particular to abstain from all appearances of mirth and pleasantry, which were looked upon as the marks of a carnal mind. The Saint was of a sorrowful countenance, and generally eaten up with spleen and melancholy. A Gentleman, who was lately a great ornament to the learned world, has diverted me more than once with an account of the reception which he met with from a very famous independent Minister, who was head of a college in those times. This Gentleman was then a young adventurer in the republick of letters, and just fitted out for the University with a good cargo of Latin and Greek. His friends were resolved that he should try his fortune at an election which was drawing near in the college, of which the Independent minister whom I have before-mentioned was Governor. The youth, according to custom, waited on him in order to be examined. He was received at the door by a servant, who was one of that gloomy generation that were then in fashion. He conducted him, with great silence and seriousness, to a long gallery, which was darkened at noon-day, and had only a single candle burning in it. After a short stay in this melancholy apartment, he was led into a chamber hung with black, where he entertained himself for some time by the glimmering of a taper, till at length the head of the college came out to him, from an inner room, with half a dozen night-caps upon his head, and religious horror in his countenance. The young man trembled; but his fears increased, when, instead of being asked what progress he had made in learning, he was examined how he abounded in grace. His Latin and Greek fled him in little head; he was to give an account only of the state of his Soul, whether he was of the number of the Elect; what was the occasion of his conversion;
upon what day of the month, and hour of the day it happened; how it was carried on, and when compleated. The whole examination was summed up with one short question, namely, Whether he was prepared for Death? The boy, who had been bred up by honest parents, was frighted out of his wits at the solemnity of the proceeding, and especially by the last dreadful interrogatory; so that upon making his escape out of this house of mourning, he could never be brought a second time to the examination, as not being able to go through the terrors of it.

Notwithstanding this general form and outside of religion is pretty well worn out among us, there are many persons, who, by a natural uncheerfulness of heart, mistaken notions of piety, or weaknesses of understanding, love to indulge this uncomfortable way of life, and give up themselves a prey to grief and melancholy. Superstitious fears and groundless scruples cut them off from the pleasures of conversation, and all those social entertainments, which are not only innocent, but laudable; as if mirth was made for reprobates, and cheerfulness of heart denied those who are the only persons that have a proper title to it.

_Sombrias_ is one of these sons of sorrow. He thinks himself obliged in duty to be sad and disconsolate. He looks on a sudden fit of laughter as a breach of his baptismal vow. An innocent jest startles him like blasphemy. Tell him of one who is advanced to a title of Honour, he lifts up his hands and eyes; describe a publick ceremony, he shakes his head; shew him a gay equipage, he blesses himself. All the little ornaments of life are pomp and vanities. Mirth is wanton, and wit profane. He is scandalized at youth for being lively, and at childhood for being playful. He sits at a christening, or a marriage-feast, as at a funeral; fights at the conclusion of a merry story, and grows devout when the rest of the company grow pensive. After all, _Sombrias_ is a religious man, and would have behaved himself very properly, had he lived when Christianity was under a general persecution.

I would by no means presume to tax such characters with hypocrisy, as is done too frequently; that being a vice which I think none but he, who knows the secrets of mens hearts, should pretend to discover in another, where the proofs of it do not amount to demonstration. On the contrary, as there are many excellent persons, who are weighed down by this habitual sorrow of heart, they rather deserve our compassion than our reproaches. I think, however, they would do well to consider, whether such a behaviour does not deter men from a religious life, by representing it as an unfavourable state, that extinguishes all joy and gladness, darkens the face of nature, and destroys the relish of being itself.
I have, in former papers, shewn how great a tendency there is to cheerfulness in religion, and how such a frame of mind is not only the most lovely, but the most commendable in a virtuous person. In short, those who represent religion in so unamiable a light, are like the spies, sent by Moses to make a discovery of the land of Promise, when by their reports they discouraged the people from entering upon it. Those who show us the joy, the cheerfulness, the good-humour, that naturally spring up in this happy state, are like the spies bringing along with them the clusters of grapes, and delicious fruits, that might invite their companions into the pleasant country which produced them.

An eminent Pagan writer has made a discourse, to shew that the atheist, who denies a God, does him less dishonour than the man who owns his Being, but at the same time believes him to be cruel, hard to please, and terrible to human nature. For my own part, says he, I would rather it should be said of me, that there was never any such man as Plutarch, than that Plutarch was ill-natured, capricious, or inhumane.

If we may believe our Logicians, man is distinguished from all other creatures by the faculty of laughter. He has a heart capable of mirth, and naturally disposed to it. It is not the business of virtue to exterminate the affections of the mind, but to regulate them. It may moderate and restrain, but was not designed to banish gladness from the heart of man. Religion contracts the circle of our pleasures, but leaves it wide enough for her votaries to expiate in. The contemplation of the Divine Being, and the exercise of virtue, are in their own nature so far from excluding all gladness of heart, that they are perpetual sources of it. In a word, the true spirit of religion cheers, as well as composes the Soul; it banishes indeed all levity of behaviour, all vicious and disfoliate mirth, but in exchange fills the mind with a perpetual serenity, uninterrupted cheerfulness, and an habitual inclination to please others, as well as to be pleased in it self.
As I am one, who, by my Profession, am obliged to look into all kinds of men, there are none whom I consider with so much pleasure, as those who have any thing new or extraordinary in their characters, or ways of living. For this reason I have often amused myself with Speculations on the race of people called Jews, many of whom I have met with in most of the considerable towns which I have pass'd through in the course of my travels. They are, indeed, disseminated through all the trading parts of the world, that they are become the instruments by which the most distant nations converse with one another, and by which mankind are knit together in a general correspondence; they are like the pegs and nails in a great building, which, though they are but little valued in themselves, are absolutely necessary to keep the whole frame together.

That I may not fall into any common beaten tracks of observation, I shall consider this people in three views: first, with regard to their number; secondly, their dispersion; and, thirdly, their adherence to their religion: and afterwards endeavour to shew, first, what natural reasons, and, secondly, what providential reasons may be assigned for these three remarkable particulars.

The Jews are looked upon by many to be as numerous at present, as they were formerly in the land of Canaan.

This is wonderful, considering the dreadful slaughter made of them under some of the Roman Emperors, which historians describe by the death of many hundred thousands in a war; and the innumerable massacres and persecutions they have undergone in Turkey, as well as in all Christian nations of the world. The Rabbins, to express the great havoc... vock which has been sometimes made of them, tell us, after their usual manner of hyperbole, that there were such torrents of holy blood shed, as carried rocks of a hundred yards in circumference above three miles into the sea.

Their dispersion is the second remarkable particular in this people. They swarm over all the East, and are settled in the remotest parts of China: they are spread through most of the nations of Europe and Africa, and many families of them are established in the West-Indies: not to mention whole nations bordering on Prester John's country, and some discovered in the inner parts of America, if we may give any credit to their own writers.

Their firm adherence to their religion, is no less remarkable than their numbers and dispersion, especially considering it as persecuted or contemned over the face of the whole earth. This is likewise the more remarkable, if we consider the frequent apostacies of this people, when they lived under their Kings, in the land of Promise, and within sight of their temple.

If in the next place we examine, what may be the natural reasons for the three particulars which we find in the Jews, and which are not to be found in any other religion or people, I can, in the first place, attribute their numbers to nothing but their constant employment, their subfinence, their exemption from wars, and, above all, their frequent marriages; for they look on celibacy as an accursed state, and generally are married before twenty, as hoping the Messiah may descend from them.

The dispersion of the Jews into all the nations of the earth, is the second remarkable particular of that people, though not so hard to be accounted for. They were always in rebellions and tumults while they had the temple and holy city in view, for which reason they have often been driven out of their old habitations in the land of Promise. They have as often been banished out of most other places where they have settled, which made very much disperse and scatter a people, and oblige them to seek a livelihood where they can find it. Besides, the whole people is now a race of such Merchants as are wanderers by profession, and, at the same time, are in most, if not all, places incapable of either lands or offices, that might engage them to make any part of the world their home.

This dispersion would probably have lost their religion, had it not been secured by the strength of its constitution: for they are to live all in a body, and generally within the same enclofure, to marry among themselves, selves, and to eat no meats that are not killed or prepared their own way.
This shuts them out from all table-conversation, and the most agreeable intercourse of life; and, by consequence, excludes them from the most probable means of conversion.

If, in the last place, we consider what providential reason may be as signed for these three particulars, we shall find that their numbers, dispersion, and adherence to their religion, have furnished every age, and every nation of the world, with the strongest arguments for the Christian faith, not only as these very particulars are foretold of them, but as they themselves are the depositaries of these and all the other prophecies, which tend to their own confusion. Their number furnishes us with a sufficient cloud of witnesses, that attest the truth of the old bible. Their dispersion spreads these witnesses through all parts of the world. The adherence to their religion makes their testimony unquestionable. Had the whole body of Jews been converted to Christianity, we should certainly have thought all the prophecies of the Old Testament, that relate to the coming and history of our Blessed Saviour, forged by Christians, and have looked upon them, with the prophecies of the Sibyls, as made many years after the events they pretend to foretell.

Perf.

MY friend WILL. HONEYCOMB has told me, for above this half year, that he had a great mind to try his hand at a Spectator, and that he would fain have one of his writing in my works. This morning I received from him the following Letter, which, after having rectified some little orthographical mistakes, I shall make a Prefert of to the public.

Dear
Dear Spec.

I was, about two nights ago, in company with very agreeable young people of both sexes, where talking of some of your papers which are written on conjugal love, there arose a dispute among us, whether there were not more bad husbands in the world than bad wives. A Gentleman, who was Advocate for the Ladies, took this occasion to tell us the story of a famous siege in Germany, which I have since found related in my historical Dictionary, after the following manner. When the Emperor Conrad the third had besieged Guelpens, Duke of Bavaria, in the city of Hensberg, the women finding that the town could not hold out long, petitioned the Emperor that they might depart out of it, with so much as each of them could carry. The Emperor knowing they could not convey away many of their effects, granted them their petition; when the women, to his great surprize, came out of the place with every one her husband upon her back. The Emperor was so moved at the sight, that he burst into tears, and after having very much extolled the women for their conjugal affection, gave the men to their wives, and received the Duke into his favour.

The Ladies did not a little triumph at this story, asking us, at the same time, whether in our consciences we believed that the men of any town in Great Britain would, upon the same offer, and at the same conjuncture, have loaded themselves with their wives; or rather whether they would not have been glad of such an opportunity to get rid of them? To this my very good friend Tom Dapperwitz, who took upon him to be the mouth of our sex, replied, that they would be very much to blame if they would not do the same good office for the women, considering that their strength would be greater, and their burdens lighter. As we were amusing ourselves with discourses of this nature, in order to pass away the evening, which now begins to grow tedious, we fell into that laudable and primitive diversion of Questions and Commands. I was no sooner vested with the regal authority, but I enjoined all the Ladies, under pain of my displeasure, to tell the company ingenuously, in case they had been in the siege abovementioned, and had the same offers made them as the good women of that place, what every one of them would have brought off with her, and have thought most worth the saving? There were several merry answers made to my question, which entertainment us till bed-time. This filled my mind with such a multitude of ideas, that upon my going to sleep, I fell into the following dream.
I saw a town of this Island, which shall be nameless, invested on every side, and the inhabitants of it so straitned as to cry for quarter. The General refused any other terms than those granted to the above-mentioned town of Hensberg, namely, that the married women might come out with what they could bring along with them. Immediately the gate flew open, and a female procession appeared, multitudes of the sex following one another in a row, and staggering under their respective burdens. I took my stand upon an eminence in the enemy's camp, which was appointed for the general rendezvous of these female carriers, being very desirous to look into their several ladings. The first of them had a huge sack upon her shoulders, which she let down with great care: upon the opening of it, when I expected to have seen her husband shoot out of it, I found it was filled with China-ware.

The next appeared in a more decent figure, carrying a handsome young fellow upon her back: I could not forbear commending the young woman for her conjugal affection, when to my great surprize, I found that she had left the good man at home, and brought away her gallant. I saw the third, at some distance, with a little withered face peeping over her shoudler, whom I could not suspect for any but her spouse, till upon her setting him down I heard her call him dear Pugg, and found him to be her favourite Monkey. A fourth brought a huge bale of cards along with her; and the fifth a Bolonia Lap-dog; for her husband, it seems, being a very burly man, the thought it would be less trouble for her to bring away little Cupid. The next was the wife of a rich usurer, laden with a bag of gold; she told us that her spouse was very old, and by the course of nature, could not expect to live long; and that to shew her tender regards for him, she had saved that which the poor man loved better than his life. The next came towards us with her son upon her back, who, we were told, was the greatest rake in the place, but so much the mother's darling, that she left her husband behind with a large family of hopeful sons and daughters, for the sake of this graceless youth.

It would be endless to mention the several persons, with their several loads, that appeared to me in this strange vision. All the place about me was covered with packs of ribband, broacades, embroidery, and ten thousand other materials, sufficient to have furnished a whole street of toy-shops. One of the women, having a husband that was none of the heaviest, was bringing him off upon her shoulders, at the same time that she carried a great bundle of Flanders-lace under her arm.
arm; but finding her self so over-loaden, that she could not save both of them, she dropped the good man, and brought away the bundle.
In short, I found but one husband among this great mountain of baggage, who was a lively cobbler, and kicked and spurred all the while his wife was carrying him on, and, as it was said, had scarce passed a day in his life without giving her the discipline of the strap.
I cannot conclude my Letter, Dear Spec, without telling thee one very odd whim in this my dream. I saw, methought, a dozen women employed in bringing off one man; I could not guess who it should be, till upon his nearer approach I discovered thy short phiz. The women all declared that it was for the sake of thy works, and not thy perfon, that they brought thee off, and that it was on condition that thou shouldst continue the Spectator. If thou thinkest this dream will make a tolerable one, it is at thy service, from,

Dear Spec, Thine, sleeping and waking,

WILL. HONEYCOMB.

The Ladies will see, by this Letter, what I have often told them, that WILL. is one of those old-fashioned men of wit and pleasure of the town, that thews his parts by raillery on marriage, and one who has often tried his fortune that way without success. I cannot however dismiss his Letter, without observing, that the true story on which it is built does honour to the sex, and that in order to abuse them, the writer is obliged to have recourse to dream and fiction.
SIR,

"YOU, who are so well acquainted with the story of Socrates, "must have read how, upon his making a discourse concerning "love, he pressed his point with so much success, that all "the bachelors in his audience took a resolution to marry by the first "opportunity, and that all the married men immediately took horse and "galloped home to their wives. I am apt to think your discourses, in "which you have drawn so many agreeable pictures of marriage, have "had a very good effect this way in England. We are obliged to you, "at least, for having taken off that fenfeless ridicule, which for many "years the witlings of the town have turned upon their fathers and mo-"thers. For my own part, I was born in wedlock, and I do not care "who knows it: for which reason, among many others, I should look "upon my self as a moft injufferable coxcomb, did I endeavour to main-"tain that cuckoldom was infeparable from marriage, or to make use of "husband and wife as terms of reproach. Nay, Sir, I will go one step "further, and declare to you before the whole world, that I am a mar-"ried man, and at the same time I have so much assurance as not to be "ashamed of what I have done.

"Among the several pleasures that accompany this state of life, "and which you have described in your former papers, there are two "you have not taken notice of, and which are seldom cast into the ac-"count, by those who write on this subject. You must have observed, "in your Speculations on human nature, that nothing is more gratifying "to the mind of man than power or dominion; and this I think my self "amply posseffed of, as I am the father of a family. I am perpetually "taken taken up in giving out orders, in prescribing duties, in hearing parties, in administering justice, and in distributing rewards and punishments.

To speak in the language of the Centurion, I say unto one, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant,
Do this, and he doeth it. In short, Sir, I look upon my family as a paternal sovereignty, in which I am myself both King and Priest.
All great governments are nothing else but clusters of these little pri-ivate royalties, and therefore I consider the masters of families as small deputy-governors presiding over the several little parcels and divisions of their fellow-subjects. As I take great pleasure in the administration of my government in particular, so I look upon myself not only as a more useful, but as a much greater and happier man than any batchelor in England of my own rank and condition.

There is another accidental advantage in marriage, which has likewise fallen to my share, I mean the having a multitude of children.
These I cannot but regard as very great blessings. When I see my little troop before me, I rejoice in the additions which I have made to my species, to my country, and to my religion, in having produced such a number of reasonable creatures, citizens, and christians. I am pleased to see my self thus perpetuated; and as there is no producion comparable to that of a human creature, I am more proud of having been the occasion of ten such glorious productions, than if I had built a hundred pyramids at my own expense, or published as many volumes of the finest wit and learning. In what a beautiful light has the Holy Scripture represented Abdon, one of the judges of Israel, who had forty sons and thirty grandsons, that rode on three-score and ten As-cols, according to the magnificence of the eastern countries? how must the heart of the old man rejoice, when he saw such a beautiful procession of his own descendants, such a numerous cavalcade of his own raising? For my own part, I can sit in my parlour with great content, when I take a review of half a dozen of my little boys mounted upon their hobby-horses, and of as many little girls tutoring their babies, each of them endeavouring to excel the rest, and to do something that may gain my favour and approbation. I cannot question but he who has blessed me with so many children, will assist my endeavours in providing for them. There is one thing I am able to give each of them, which is a virtuous education. I think it is Sir Francis Bacon's observation, that in a numerous family of children the eldest is often spoiled by the prospect of an estate, and the youngest by being the darling of the parent; but that some one or other in the middle, who has not perhaps been regarded, has made his way in the world, and over-topped the rest. It is my business to implant in every one of my children the same seeds of industry, and the same honest principles.

By this means I think I have a fair chance, that one or other of them to grow considerable in some or other way of life, whether it be in the army, or in the fleet, in trade, or any of the three learned professions; for you must know, Sir, that from long experience and observation, I am persuaded of what seems a paradox to most of those with whom I converse, namely, that a man who has many children, and gives them a good education, is more likely to raise a family, than he who has but one, notwithstanding he leaves him his whole estate. For this reason I cannot forbear amusing myself with finding out a General, an Admiral, or an Alderman of London, a Divine, a Physician, or a Lawyer, among my little people who are now perhaps in petticoats; and when I see the motherly airs of my little daughters when they are playing with their puppets, I cannot but flatter myself that their husbands and children will be happy in the possession of such wives and mothers.

If you are a father, you will not perhaps think this Letter impertinent; but if you are a single man, you will not know the meaning of it, and probably throw it into the fire: Whatever you determine of it, you may assure yourself that it comes from one who is.

Your most humble servant, and well-wisher,

Thursdays,

Philemon.
Those who have maintained that men would be more miserable than beasts, were their hopes confined to this life only; among other considerations take notice that the latter are only afflicted with the anguish of the present evil, whereas the former are very often pained by the reflection on what is past, and the fear of what is to come. This fear of any future difficulties or misfortunes is so natural to the mind, that were a man's sorrows and disquietudes fummed up at the end of his life, it would generally be found that he had suffered more from the apprehension of such evils as never happened to him, than from those evils which had really befallen him. To this we may add, that among those evils which befall us, there are many that have been more painful to us in the prospect, than by their actual pressure.

This natural impatience to look into futurity, and to know what accidents may happen to us hereafter, has given birth to many ridiculous arts and inventions. Some found their preceience on the lines of a man's hand, others on the features of his face; some on the signatures which nature has impressed on his body, and others on his own hand-writing; some read.

Non habeo denique nauci Marsum augurem,
Non vicanos aruspices, non de circu astrologos,
Non Iisacos conjectores, non interpretes somnium;
Non enim sunt ii aut scientia, aut arte divini,
Sed superstitionis vates, impudentesque harioli,
Aut inermes, aut infans, aut qui hucus egeflas imperat;
Qui sui quaestus causa siclas suscitam sententias,
Qui sibi sramitam non sapient, alteri monstrant viam,
Quibus divinitas pollicentur, ab is drachmam petunt;
De divitiis deductum drachmam, reddant oetera. Ennius.
read men's fortunes on the stars, as others have searched after them in the entrails of beasts, or the flights of birds. Men of the best sense have been touched, more or less, with these groundless horrors and pretenses of futurity, upon surveying the most indifferent works of Nature. Can any thing be more surprizing than to consider Cicero, who made the greatest figure at the bar, and in the Senate of the Roman Commonwealth, and, at the same time, outshined all the Philosophers of Antiquity in his library and in his retirements, as busying himself in the college of Augurs, and observing, with a religious attention, after what manner the chickens pecked the several grains of corn which were throwen to them? Notwithstanding these follies are pretty well worn out of the minds of the wise and learned in the present age, multitudes of weak and ignorant persons are still slaves to them. There are numberless arts of prediction among the vulgar, which are too trifling to enumerate; and infinite observations of days, numbers, voices, and figures, which are regarded by them as portents and prodigies. In short, every thing prophesies to the superstitious man, there is scarce a straw or a rusty piece of iron that lies in his way by accident.

It is not to be conceived how many wizards, gypsies and cunning-men are dispersed through all the countries and market-towns of Great Britain, not to mention the Fortune-tellers and Astrologers, who live very comfortably upon the curiosity of several well-disposed persons in the cities of London and Westminster.

Among the many pretended arts of Divination, there is none which so universally amuses as that by dreams. I have indeed observed in a late Speculation, that there have been sometimes, upon very extraordinary occasions, supernatural revelations made to certain persons by this means; but as it is the chief business of this paper to root out popular errors, I must endeavour to expose the folly and superstitious of those persons, who, in the common and ordinary course of life, lay any stress upon things of so uncertain, shadowy, and chimerical a nature. This I cannot do more effectually than by the following letter, which is dated from a quarter of the town that has always been the habitation of some prophetick Philomath; it having been usual, time out of mind, for all such people as have lost their wits, to resort to that place either for their cure or for their instruction.

Mr.
Mr. Spectator

Moorfields, Octob. 4. 1711

"Having long considered whether there be any trade wanting in this great city, after having surveyed very attentively all kinds of ranks and professions, I do not find in any quarter of the town an oneotrick, or, in plain English, an interpreter of dreams. For want of so useful a person, there are several good people who are very much puzzled in this particular, and dream a whole year together without being ever the wiser for it. I hope I am pretty well qualified for this office, having studied by candlelight all the rules of art which have been laid down upon this subject. My great uncle by my wife's side was a Scotch Highlander, and second-fitched. I have four fingers and two thumbs upon one hand, and was born on the longest night of the year. My chriltian and sir-name begin and end with the same letters. I am lodged in Moorfields, in a house that for these fifty years has been always tenanted by a conjurer.

If you had been in company, so much as my self, with ordinary women of the town, you must know that there are many of them who every day in their lives, upon seeing or hearing of anything that is un-no-ted, cry, My Dream is out; and cannot go to sleep in quiet the next night, till something or other has happened which has expounded the visions of the preceding one. There are others who are in very great pain for not being able to recover the circumstances of a Dream, that made strong impressions upon them while it lasted. In short, Sir, there are many whose waking thoughts are wholly employed on their sleeping ones. For the benefit therefore of this curious and inquisitive part of my fellow-subjects, I shall in the first place tell those persons what they dreamt of, who fancy they never dream at all. In the next place, I shall make out any dream, upon hearing a single circumstance of it; and in the last place, shall expound to them the good or bad fortune which such dreams portend. If they do not preface good luck, I shall advise nothing for my pains; not questioning at the same time that those who consult me will be so reasonable as to afford me a moderate share out of any considerable estate, profit or emolument which I shall thus discover to them. I interpret to the poor for nothing, on condition that their names may be inferred in publick Advertisements, to attest the truth of such my interpretations. As for people of quality or others, who are indifferent, and do not care to come in person, I can interpret their dreams by seeing their water. I set aside one day in a week.
"week for lovers; and interpret by the great for any Gentlewoman who is turned of sixty, after the rate of half a crown per week, with the usual allowances for good luck. I have several rooms and apartments fitted up, at reasonable rates, for such as have not conveniencies for dreaming at their own houses.

Titus Trophonius.
